Mr. GALLINGER. What paper is it in?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is from the New York World of September 10, and would appear to be a charge that is very serious and that needs investigation. If it were like those that Mr. Bishop illustrated with by sending to us, I would not incorporate it, but this came from another source and has sufficient weight behind it to make it worthy of the consideration of the Interoceanic Canal Committee to go to the root of it. It, as I said, relates to the letting of the contract by Mr. Shonts to one J. E. Markel.

Mr. TELLER. Let it be read.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is getting late, and I do not want to take all day. If the Senator wants to hear it I will send it to the desk and have it read. Probably it is better to do that. I do not want to shoot at anybody from the bushes.

Mr. GALLINGER. The concession has been revoked since then.

Mr. ALLISON. It never went into effect.

Mr. GALLINGER. It never went into effect.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the scandal, if there be scandal, comes in the original contract having ever been made, and the reasons which actuated those who let it. That is where the milk in the cocoanut is, if it has got any.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the matter referred to.

The Secretary read as follows:

SHONTS ADMITS TRUTH OF CANAL FOOD CHARGES—WAS A PANAMA RAILROAD CONTRACT, AND LAW DOESN'T REQUIRE ADVERTISING FOR BIDS—MENUS SHOWN—RIVAL BIDDER SAW HUDGINS & DUMAS'S—THE CHAIRMAN FAVORED J. E. MARKEL ON ACCOUNT OF HIS LARGE EXPERIENCE.

"I turned over all those menus to D. W. Ross, the general purchasing officer of the Panama Railroad. I suggested that it was a good thing to let all the bidders know what menus each one turned in.

"I am not a hotel man and I did not attempt to frame up specifications that would have required the training of a hotel man to get up. I just asked all these men right in here, and around this table we talked over the matter of bids and what should be put in the bids."—Statement made by Chairman Theodore P. Shonts, of the Isthmian Canal Commission, at his office, No. 24 State street, yesterday.

Theodore P. Shonts admitted yesterday the truth of one of the charges made by Hudgins & Dumas, bidders on the contract to feed Panama Canal employees, that a sample copy of a menu they included in their bid for the commissary concession was given to the successful bidder, J. E. Markel, of Omaha, by his authority.

"Concerning the talk about collusion," said Chairman Shonts, "I will say that if Mr. Markel put in his written offer the exact weekly menu that the other bidders put in theirs, that is exactly what he should have done. I told Mr. Ross, our purchasing agent, that it would be well for him to get suggestions from all the bidders and put the specifications in the written offers as much alike as possible, so that a fair comparison of the bids could be made."

The estimate made by Hudgins & Dumas, that the contract for the commissary work along the canal would be worth $50,000,000 for the five years' term, is too high, Mr. Shonts thinks, as many of the canal employees will live in houses to be built along the canal, instead of in the commissary hotels and camps.

"I gave J. E. Markel the contract, it is true, without any advertising in advance," added Chairman Shonts. "It was not a Government matter that required any advertising, but was a Panama Railroad contract. I made a common-sense selection and the best I could make. There may not have been much red tape in sight, but it was absolutely necessary for us to do something in a great hurry to get decent commissary service along the canal. Mr. Stevens, down on the Isthmus, was daily asking us to send his men food.

"When I found one bid so much lower than what seemed to me possible I did write a letter, just as Hudgins & Dumas say, calling attention to some apparent misunderstanding on their part. I wrote a letter worded almost the same to all the bidders. The low bid was amended, and the bidders who are now objecting thanked me and admitted the misapprehension under which I thought they were laboring. The contract was then let, after the figures, the experience of the bidders, and the facilities they had were all considered.

"For instance, J. E. Markel, the successful bidder, has been in the commissary business for forty years. He holds contracts for the commissary trains along the line of the Illinois Central, Kansas City Southern, and other roads. He has hundreds of men ready to send to the Isthmus. They are all trained men. If he keeps a corps there a few months and the climate so enervates them that they have to come back he has a new corps ready.

"Hudgins & Dumas, who had the commissary contract for Ellis Island, did well with it, but this Isthmus contract is a different proposition. I thought Markel could swing it better than anyone else. He got the contract."

Another point brought out by Chairman Shonts was that the Panama Republic in its treaty rights excluded the commissary storekeeper from coming into competition with the natives, but that as there had been such an abnormal raising of prices all over the Isthmus by the native storekeepers, the treaty had been abrogated for a while so far as allowing the Panama Canal commissary to sell general food supplies to all comers. At any moment, however, the treaty rights may be again enforced.

Hudgins & Dumas, in dealing with the contract had thought to make their money on the concessions to sell general supplies. Chairman Shonts said that the enforcing of the treaty clause would cut off this chance of profit, and that was why he wrote the firm to change its first bid.

Chairman Shonts declared that while J. E. Markel apparently was the higher in his bid he was really the lower. He offered to feed all employees over 12 years of age at $30 a month in the "gold class," which covers all the upper branch of labor. Between 12 and 5 years the price per month was put for "gold children" at $10 each. Daily boarders were to get fare at a dollar a day, and anyone between 5 and 12 years old was to get food for 40 cents a day. Single meals for adults were to cost 33⅓ cents. For children between 5 and under 12 years, 13 cents a meal was the rate.

Rooms are to be cared for at $6 a month in the Markel contract, and for children under 12 years of age there is to be no charge.

The "silver men" schedule by the month Markel offered to take at $12 a head. The "silver men" are common laborers. Under 12 years of age children were to be fed for $5 a month. Adults per day were to be charged 45 cents; children were to be taxed 20 cents. Adult single meals were to be 15 cents, with children at 10 cents.

"As the Hudgins & Dumas bids made it $30 a month on their gold schedule and $5 for the care of rooms, children to pay the same all through, the average made the Markel bid the cheaper," continued Chairman Shonts.

At the office of the Panama Railroad Company it was said that it was true, as alleged by Hudgins & Dumas, that D. W. Ross, purchasing agent of the company, and Chairman Shonts were with J. E. Markel, the successful bidder, in Panama, and that all these came back to the United States together.

J. E. Markel has given a bond in $100,000, and is now in possession of the contract, it is said. He expects to get his men in Panama in three weeks.

PRESIDENT HAS PANAMA CHARGES.

OYSTER BAY, L. I., September 9, 1905.

The complaints of Hudgins & Dumas and H. Balfe & Co., alleging unfair influences in the awarding by Chairman Shonts, of the Panama Canal Commission of a $50,000,000 commissary concession to J. E. Markel, of Omaha, Nebr., were received by the President this morning.

The President, after reading the telegrams, referred the matter to Shonts, with the request that a report be made upon the charges as soon as possible. The President will take no action pending the Shonts report.

It is understood here that pending official and specific information on the subject the President is not inclined to attach undue importance to the mere fact that the huge Panama contract was awarded to the highest instead of the lowest bidder. It is pointed out that Hudgins & Dumas were themselves awarded the valuable Ellis Island commissary concession a few years ago, although their bid was much higher than that of competitive bidders. The awarding of the contract to them was followed by vehement protests from the defeated bidders, who took the matter directly to the White House.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, it is to be expected that when bids are advertised for to do any important public work there will be more or less disappointment. The contention will usually arise from the unfortunate or unsuccessful bidder that he has been cheated or swindled, or something of that sort. We have that sort of thing coming up every day, and therefore that is to be expected. The point here that makes this possibly an exception to that is the eminent respectability of the firm of Hudgins & Dumas, who claim that this contract was given out by favoritism—a firm who have had the concession to feed the immigrants on Ellis Island, and who, I am informed, are perfectly reliable men. I presume that if the committee see fit to investigate and find out whether there was any underhanded or dirty work in the letting of this contract to Markel they can find plenty of witnesses to go to the very bottom of it. The peculiarity about this contract is that the concession or contract was suddenly canceled without apparent reason. I understand that the excuse given was that Mr. Stevens had cabled that the eating arrangements which he himself had perfected were sufficient to supply the demand, so that there was no need for any contract with anybody: but the correspondent of the New York Herald, who, as I say, is on the ground, whom I know, and I will mention his name—Mr. Alvord—who for a while was chief clerk in the Congressional Library, but who felt that he was suffocated over there in that atmosphere of dust and literature and decided he would like to get back into the world, and who went back to his old love of newspaper correspondent and is down yonder, is, I understand, writing some very interesting letters, giving what he says is the exact condition which exists there. If those letters are true, and I think it is our duty to find out whether they are true or not, it is very necessary, in the interest of economy and efficiency of work, that we find out whether the situation is as Mr. Alvord depicts it.

We heard something yesterday in regard to the relation between the Panama Railroad and the Canal Commission; that it had been found they are to all intents and purposes one and the same thing—that is, the direction and control of the railroad is under the direction and control of the Commission. I shall not go into that branch of the subject extensively because of the fact that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] indicated yesterday evening that he would take that up. I see he is here and is prepared to elaborate it fully and to show just what the situation is, and I will only mention that the newspaper article which I happen to have in my hand, dated this morning—in fact, it is the New York Herald of Friday, December 15—speaks of a condition of congestion in the management of the railroad down there that is simply fearful, that being a transcontinental line for carrying freight across the Isthmus intended for the Pacific coast of South America as well as of our own country. There are several lines of steamers from New York and ports of Europe that are handling freight and delivering it there, and I presume with the extra work that is put on the railroad by reason of this increase in labor or tax on its facilities by the canal work that is being pressed it has simply got buried under an avalanche of freight that it can not handle. That only illustrates the necessity and importance of double tracking the railroad while the canal is under construction to enable it not only to handle Government freight in the canal construction, but also to handle that transcontinental business. I think it would be very interesting to those Senators who have not read this article to have this plain story from Mr. Alvord put in the RECORD. I will ask to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks for the reading of a newspaper communication, which, in the absence of objection, will be read.

The Secretary read from the New York Herald of Friday, December 15, 1905, as follows:

CONGRESS MAY BE ASKED TO CURE PANAMA RAILROAD ILLS—PUBLICITY OF CONGESTED CONDITIONS ONLY PARTLY RELIEVED THE JAM OF FREIGHT AND CONSEQUENT LOSS TO SHIPOWNERS AND MERCHANTS.

PANAMA, December 5, 1905.

"If you had indigestion to start with and were forced to eat four or five meals a day for several months, what condition would you be in?"

That was the reply Chief Engineer Stevens made to Chairman Shonts's inquiry as to the freight blockade on the Panama Railroad. The dose of publicity given by the Herald has helped the patient, but the medicine must be continued. Mr. Stevens subsequently cabled Washington that the road was in its normal condition. It is. There are more than 6,000 tons of delayed international freight piled up in Colon and Panama, and steamships are still forced to lose days in idleness waiting until overcrowded wharves are cleared so that they may come alongside and discharge their cargoes. No fault can be found with the disposition on the part of resident railroad managers to remedy this condition. They are now keenly alive to the necessity of permitting the world's commerce to flow unhindered across the Isthmus and are doing all in their power to move cargoes as fast as received.

For this improvement the shipping agents are warm in their thanks to the Herald, to those editorials, based on the facts of the case, they ascribe the change of spirit that has come over the hitherto autocratic transisthmian carriers. Mr. W. G. Baird, of the Rock Island system, the new superintendent, has done wonders, considering the inefficient subordinates he has had to help him. One of the chief mistakes seems to be that he is forced to do all the work himself.

The whole road needs reorganization. By laboring actually night and day Mr. Baird has managed to reduce the congested freight from 8,500 tons, when the Herald called attention to the glut, to about 6,000 tons, which he promises to clear in time.

This is pleasant news to shippers, but they know he can not do much under the policy of indifference to the rights of commerce pursued by the Canal Commission.

Secretary Taft and Chairman Shonts amuse the Zone officials and assistants alike. After touch and go visits of a few hours, during which they plainly show they almost know they are going to die of yellow fever, the Secretary returns to Washington to give out interviews of impressions and the chairman in after-dinner speeches shows clearly to whom he thinks credit should go for the wonderful things done on the Isthmus.

There has been progress. The sanitation is better; all classes of employees live in suitable habitations; wholesome food is furnished at reasonable cost; the dirt will soon fly to some purpose if Mr. Stevens is let alone.

There would seem to be no need of exaggeration on the part of those who have prudently remained 2,000 miles away while all this has been brought about. Mr. Taft's statement that Panama is being rapidly paved and that the jungle has been cleared away for half a mile on both sides of the railroad must be impressions. The paving was begun in October. On December 1, by actual measurement, 380 feet had been laid. In no place has the jungle been cleared away for more than 30 rods at camps, and for the most part the branches and leaves of tropical plants wave with the wind of passing trains. These are not important facts, but they illustrate the value of impressions. The voicing of these impressions may have been to offset "the industrious and voluble band of Ananiases" which, Mr. Shonts told the American hardware manufacturers at their banquet in Washington, moves to and fro in the land to deny the reports he and the Secretary make at long range.

Taking their cue from Assistant Secretary Rossbottom, of the Panama Railroad Company, who stated to a Herald reporter in New York that the cause of the glut of international freight on the Isthmus was due to the shutting of Central American ports against the railroad during the last season, the official impressionists in Washington ascribe the disgraceful condition of the freight business eighteen months after the Commission took charge of the road to the quarantine of Panama on account of the bubonic plague and yellow fever.

FACTS V. IMPRESSIONS.

That is their impression. What are the facts? The first quarantine for bubonic plague began on June 28 and ended on July 18. The dates are from the records of the shipping houses affected, as are the following facts: In this short three weeks only ports in Nicaragua and Costa Rica were closed. Not one port in all the long coast south of Panama, where the bulk of American and European merchandise is consigned, was closed a minute in consequence of the plague.

There was another period of quarantine for the plague in August, affecting the same ports for about the same short time. At no time has there been any quarantine on the Pacific coast on account of yellow fever. The shippers assert that this is true. It is an important fact, for it serves to illustrate the uselessness of trying to cover up by impressions the blunders of the Canal Commission in the management of a short railroad that formerly was of service to international trade.

An investigation of shipping conditions made on December 1 by the Herald correspondent showed the statement that all accumulated freight is now cleared away to be also an impression. Current freight is being moved more promptly, but there is still a congestion and always will be under the present system of conducting the business of the road.

Mr. Shonts, in his famous "Me, Taft, and Roosevelt" speech, said that the only really valuable asset from the French was the Panama Railroad; that it had been neglected and was obsolete; that its wharves, warehouses, terminal facilities, locomotives, and cars were unable to handle the commercial business the road was doing; that it had no mechanical appliances on the docks to assist in receiving or discharging steamer's cargoes; that it was paralyzed by additional work required of it for the canal, and that "it was necessary, consequently, to begin at once the construction of new wharves, equipped with modern mechanical appliances, and of terminal yards at both ends of the road, of extensive warehouses, of new and more powerful locomotives, larger passenger and freight cars," etc.

That was the promise eighteen months ago. The Commission started with three wharves at Colon, and the promise that it would line for a mile with new docks the magnificent water front afforded by the canal, which the French had dug far into the interior. To-day there are five wharves, the old ones, to which little or nothing has been done, and two small and utterly inadequate new sheds built on the canal. At least ten good wharves are needed to take care of the transisthmian freight alone. There is one derrick crane on one of the new sheds, a steam transporter on the other, and two railroad or traveling cranes on flat cars. That is all the new mechanical appliances in sight. It is said that 1,100 cars have been ordered, but after eighteen months only 200 flat cars have arrived, and they are used for canal work.

The harbor is not even kept dredged. There is one old Scotch machine left by the French, for which some new buckets arrived last week.

The result in one instance of all the wonderful things that were to be done is the utter disruption of the regular sailings of vessels from the Pacific side. Before the Canal Commission began its work it was a matter of pride for years for one line to arrive at Colon on Monday and sail with its cargo from Panama on Thursday. It has not been able to do this since the Commission took hold, and the schedule has been abandoned.

SOME RECENT EXPERIENCES.

The logs of the two steamers since the normal condition of the road was announced in Washington indicate that the impressionists are still active. The Dictator, with 1,400 tons of freight, from Liverpool, made Colon on November 21. She should have been discharged at once. She was not touched for two days and was not finished until November 29. Her sailing date was November 24. The bulk of this freight on December 1 was still on the Colon wharf. It should all have been in Panama one week before. The loss to this vessel through the delay of the railway was about $500.

The Isis, with 1,700 tons of freight, from Hamburg, arrived on November 29. She was held a day in stream, owing to the overcrowded condition of the wharves, and suffered a loss of $300 from the same cause as the Dictator. On December 2 the French and Italian steamers arrived. There was a berth for only one, and the Italian had to lie at anchor. On December 3 the Nicaraguan arrived and was not berthed until December 5. This shows the need of wharves at Colon and the failure of the Commission to provide them.

Its delinquency so far as supplying railroad facilities is concerned was demonstrated by an inspection of the wharves. On December 1 wharf No. 1 was jammed with freight discharged by the Virginia, which arrived on November 24. At wharf No. 2 the Isis and the Venetian, which arrived on November 28 and was also held a day in stream, were discharging. Wharf No. 4 was fairly cleared, a great improvement over two weeks before. The other wharves were badly crowded. The desire of the railroad company to force steamers to berth at No. 2 is well understood and resented by forwarders. It is a very costly wharf for ships. Tracks have been put down the center, presumably to take cargo direct from vessels, but when there are no cars—as is now always the case—the freight has to be piled on the narrow sides that remain. The ship pays for putting cargo over the side, but all other expense should fall on the railroad. When the cars are not there the wharfage room soon fills up, and the ship is compelled to employ labor to take its freight out of the way or stop unloading. To hold the ship idle is expensive, and the freight is piled along the sides. This costs about 40 cents a ton. It is expensive to the railroad, too, which is now a United States Government line. It costs it as much more to move the freight thus piled. If the cars were there, there would be no expense, as it could be loaded from the ship's slings. The congestion makes this impossible.

All the claims of the impressionists at the head of the Canal Commission that ample wharves have been built and railroad facilities provided to care for international commerce are groundless. It has suffered terribly since the Commission took charge of its only avenue across the Isthmus. It is a case of lack of foresight in the first place and indifference or incapacity since the cries of the shippers began. The owners of one of the largest lines that has suffered wrote to its agents for an explanation of the insufferable conditions on the Isthmus, and the reply is an indictment of the Canal Commission, to which the attention of Congress may be called.

These are the counts:

First. Failure to increase the number of cars of the Panama Railroad to keep pace with the traffic, or to enlarge wharves, or to provide sufficient warehouse accommodation to allow cars and cargoes to be unloaded and stored promptly.

Second. Failure to recognize the paramount necessity of increasing the number of all kinds of cars to cope with the large increase of traffic caused by the business of the canal, to construct wharves inside the canal of sufficient capacity to handle its business without interfering with those outside devoted to transit traffic, and failing when this was not done to dredge the canal to allow vessels bringing canal material sufficient water to get to the inadequate docks, thus forcing them to outside docks, to the costly delay of regular commerce.

Third. Failure to employ proper stevedores to handle wharf labor, which results in great loss of time to both ship and railroad. Even with the poor facilities competent stevedores would be able to load and discharge ships much more quickly than is now possible.

Fourth. Lack of a head to the freight department of the railroad.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the article just read illustrates, if anything, the chaotic condition on the Isthmus by reason of mismanagement or nonmanagement of the Panama Railway. I said, before having the article read, that there was, of course, a great increase of work required of the railroad; but that was to be expected. This thing has been going on now for two years and more, and even a single-track railway with sufficient switches can handle a vast amount of freight when it has only got 46 miles to transport it. If there is now efficient and able management there and money is not being squandered, as well as the whole thing being mismanaged, it ought to be a source of congratulation to the people of the country that we appear to have gotten some one there who is better qualified than those we have heretofore had there. But, in view of the misinformation, or the contradiction in the statements which have been made in regard to the situation on the Isthmus as to docks and all that kind of thing, and about pavements that we have been told exist, but which this correspondent says are mere figments of the imagination and have no actual existence, there is evidently a misrepresentation going on in high places as to the actual conditions. While we may have the impression conveyed that those in authority hope for better conditions soon, those conditions have not yet arrived, or else this man who is on the ground and who, as I said, is a reputable gentleman whom many Senators know and who has no motive, so far as I can see, to tell lies, must be woefully mistaken.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Am I correct in the assumption that, recognizing the necessity for better transportation facilities, the Commission has taken steps to double-track the railroad across the Isthmus?

Mr. TILLMAN. I think Secretary Taft said as much.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I have noticed that their plan is to immediately commence that work. There is undoubtedly a very serious blockade there now.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes. I think the Senator will also observe, in connection with his statement, that about half of this appropriation is for increased facilities on the railroad at Panama.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, in connection with this railroad, I want to call attention to another phase of it that is a matter of very serious concern, it appears to me, to all of us, as marking our progress toward arriving at the end regardless of the legality of the path by which our officials are going. Secretary Taft has said in a speech—I have seen it somewhere from him, perhaps in his testimony before the Appropriations Committee the other day, and I am sure this is correct—that in order to make some immediate progress toward betterment of the railroad the Canal Commission had authorized the issue of some bonds, six or seven hundred thousand dollars' worth. I will ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] as to that?

Mr. ALLISON. The Canal Commission has not issued any bonds; but the Panama Railroad Company——

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Canal Commission, which is in direct control of the Panama Railway, have authorized the Panama Railway to issue its own bonds.

Mr. ALLISON. The Panama Railroad Company have issued bonds from their treasury amounting to $628,000. That is all.

Mr. TILLMAN. I read it in the copy of the hearings had before the Committee on Appropriations. I do not happen to have my hand on it now.

Mr. ALLISON. It is in the hearings, and I have this morning a letter from Secretary Taft which states the amount of the bonds sold by the Panama Railroad.

In accordance with the above authority—

That is, the authority of the directors of the Panama Railroad Company—on November 28, 1905, the 628 bonds were sold to MacKay & Co., at 105, realizing $659,400.

Mr. SPOONER. Can the Senator from Iowa inform me whether that transaction occurred before or after the acquisition by the United States of the outstanding stock?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is a very recent occurrence.

Mr. ALLISON. On November 8, 1905, these bonds were sold at $105.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Secretary anywhere in his testimony make any exposition of the theory on which that was done?

Mr. ALLISON. The general reason for it was that there was a great necessity for money and the fact that the Panama Canal Commission was indebted to the railroad. They took these bonds and sold them.

Mr. SPOONER. Has there been any expression by the Commission or by the Secretary about the question of the authority to do that thing?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think any question of the authority has been suggested either by the Secretary or the Commission. The bonds were in the treasury of the Panama Railway Company, and they needed money, and they sold them, with the privilege of redeeming them at the price at which they were sold. In the meantime they bear interest at 4½ per cent.

If the Senator from South Carolina will yield to me one minute more, I will ask to have this document—because it bears right upon this question—printed in the RECORD.

Mr. TILLMAN. Possibly I had better make myself clearly understood, and the Senator can do that afterward.

Mr. SPOONER. Were the bonds sold in the market?

Mr. ALLISON. They were sold in the market at 105, with the privilege of redeeming them at pleasure at the same rate; and it is further explained in this letter that $540,000 of the proceeds which the Senator inquired about are now on deposit with some trust company, bearing from 3 to 4 per cent interest.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator want to put that statement in the RECORD?

Mr. ALLISON. I think it had better be printed in the RECORD, or read.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am very willing to let it go in without being read—it will only consume time to read it—unless the Senator particularly desires to have it read.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the communication will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 15, 1905.

SIR: I have the honor to hand you herewith the following statements showing the financial status of the Panama Railroad Company:

Statement of income account and financial exhibit from January 1, 1905, to November 1, 1905.

Statement of estimated cash receipts and disbursements for the month of December, 1905.

Statement of payments for equipment contracted for, with estimated dates of payment.

Statement of proceeds from the sale of Treasury bonds.

It is very apparent that to meet the indebtedness of the railroad company falling due during the next few months the amount due the company by the Isthmian Canal Commission should be paid at an early date.

The exhibits left with you on Tuesday, being a statement of income account and financial exhibit and a statement of the earnings, operating expenses, and general statistics for the month of September and nine months of the fiscal year, will show full detail in respect to classified earnings, expenses, etc.

Respectfully,

WM. H. TAFT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
United States Senate.

PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY,
OFFICE OF GENERAL AUDITOR,
Washington, D. C., December 15, 1905.

On November 8, 1905, the board of directors of the Panama Railroad Company passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the executive officers be, and they are hereby, authorized to sell the 628 Panama Railroad 4½ per cent twenty-year sinking fund gold bonds, now held in the Treasury, at as favorable a price as possible, but not less than 104½, the proceeds thereof to be applied to the purchase of equipment and the improvement of the company's facilities."

In accordance with the above authority, on November 28, 1905, the 628 bonds were sold to MacKay & Co. at 105, realizing $659,409.

On account of the failure of the Panama Railroad Company to receive the amount due from the Isthmian Canal Commission, they have been required to use part of the above sum to meet their current expenses, there now being on deposit of the original amount received, with bankers and trust companies $540,000 drawing interest at 3 to 4 per cent.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 14, 1905.

Mr. TILLMAN. My only purpose in mentioning this transaction was to point out what I conceive to be the absolute usurpation of power on the part of the Commission or the railroad directors, and the members of the Commission and the railroad directors are one and the same men. I do not understand this double dealing, this hocus pocus, "now you see it and now you don't." My purpose in mentioning it was to say that they had no right in law to do this thing.

Mr. ALLISON. They claim this right because the Panama Railroad Company is a separate and distinct corporation under charter of the State of New York and organized under the laws of the State of New York. It has a distinct organization, and does a commercial business as well as the business for the Government. It runs ships, etc., between Panama and New York, as everyone knows. Therefore, as directors of the Panama Railroad Company they make such resolutions as——

Mr. TILLMAN. In other words, I go out and resolve that I have the right to do so and so, which I would not have the right to do as a Senator, but still I am a Senator, and while I recognize that the Senator is not authorized to do this thing, I do it all the same. It is just a hocus pocus. It is like the Dominican treaty programme.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly what the Senator from Iowa says is true——

Mr. TILLMAN. It is a figment of the brain—and that is all—as to the legality.

Mr. HALE. It is not that.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is a technicality.

Mr. HALE. The company is organized under the laws of the State of New York, and that is the reason why it is done. But it is easy enough for us to legislate to put an end to these conditions, so that this anomaly will disappear. But you can not blame them for continuing an organization when it is a matter of statute law of the State of New York. That is what they have done. We can stop it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am only concerned about doing it. I am not talking about what we can stop. I know we can stop it, but the only concern is that the Executive and his agents and his instruments go forward and do whatever they see fit to do without inquiring as to the constitutional or legal right to do it; that is all.

Mr. ALLISON. They are directors of the Panama Railroad Company.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; but who elected them?

Mr. ALLISON. The stockholders.

Mr. TILLMAN. The United States is the only stockholder. It is nothing more or less than increasing the public debt of the United States, and the Senator knows in legal effect that is the result. It is a wholly unwarranted and improper exercise of power.

Mr. ALLISON. That may be, although technically——

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, technically! When the members of the Panama Commission adjourn and go into the next room and organize as the directors of the Panama Railroad Company, and the railroad directors do what the Commission can not do lawfully, and then say that the thing is legal and binding, I say it is a figment of the imagination. It is a hocus pocus that comes from the fact that Secretary Taft, having had absolute domination and control, being a regular imperator or little king in the Philippines, has grown accustomed to having his own way, and he goes forward without regard to the Constitution or the law, either.

I am going back to the original contention which I made in my opening this morning, that we are degenerating and getting far away from the purposes of a free and self-governing people; that we have imported from the Philippines these Cæsar-like transactions.

Mr. HALE. One of the things the Senator complains about in this particular proceeding is that this transaction did increase the debt of the United States. I hope the Senator realizes that this whole business is going to increase the debt of the United States, and to an extent that neither he nor I ever dreamed of.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let us do it ourselves in a legal, constitutional way, and I will vote my share and take the responsibility; but I do not want any decree like that of Mr. Morales in Santo Domingo, to dish out money of the United States or contract debts for the United States, by order of the Secretary of War or by order of the Panama Railroad directors or by order of the Panama Commission. I am calling attention to a usurpation of authority somewhere.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure, always.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not rise to discuss the question whether or not the issue of bonds by the Panama Railroad Company was authorized, but I do understand the Senator to criticise the maintenance of the separate organization.

Mr. TILLMAN. No. I think it almost absolutely necessary that there should be an organization, but I want it to be sufficiently distinct, so as to have one responsible to the other. I do not want to have the two interlocked, so that you can never locate any usurpation or any mistake, and so that whenever the railroad does something wrong they will say the Canal Commission did it, and whenever the Commission does anything wrong they will say the railroad company did it. Let us separate them by legislative enactment of some kind and create through law some provision for the control of this property under the direction of the President, if you want to, but primarily under the direction of some enactment by Congress.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course it is entirely competent for the Government, it having acquired the entire stock of the company, to assume the mortgage and take the property over, so that it will be owned by the Government without the intervention of any corporation. I understood the Senator from Maine rather to commit himself to the proposition that that would be wisely done.

Mr. HALE. I beg pardon.

Mr. SPOONER. I say it is entirely competent for the Government, owning all the stock of the Panama Railroad Company, to have the property conveyed to the Government and dispense with the corporation.

Mr. HALE. Obliterate it?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes. I understood the Senator from Maine rather to commit himself to that proposition.

Mr. HALE. I think we can do that.

Mr. SPOONER. I think that is a subject which demands considerable thought.

Mr. ELKINS. Who would be the directors?

Mr. SPOONER. That can be arranged. But I think there is very much to be said, and something on both sides, and that we ought not to be too quick about that. I do not see how it is possible that the situation could be other than it is, in so far as the corporate railroad organization is maintained as the operator of the railroad, and I understood the Senator not to criticise that.

Mr. TILLMAN. Without having given any serious consideration to it, it appears to me as a practical man that it would be better to have the accounts of the railway company kept entirely separate and distinct from those of the canal——

Mr. SPOONER. I suppose they are.

Mr. TILLMAN. And that the expenditures for improvements and equipment and betterment should come in a separate category.

Mr. SPOONER. I suppose they are kept distinct.

Mr. TILLMAN. But we can not get any reports from them. The Senator from Iowa did not produce them here. Of course I presume he has them now. But I complain of this effort, by our new method of running the Government, to have us legislate in the dark, and not trust us as part and parcel and a responsible part of the Government, with the necessary facts. That is what I am trying to impress here in my feeble way. We, as Senators, owe a duty to ourselves and to our constituents and to our oaths of office to stop this control of affairs by the President and his agents when it is unlawful for him to act. That is what I am trying to impress here.

Mr. ALLISON. The accounts of the Panama Railroad Company are kept distinct and separate from the accounts of the isthmian canal.

Mr. TILLMAN. Would it not have been a nice thing for them to have sent them along?

Mr. ALLISON. The Secretary of War stated to me that he would leave with the committee a copy of one of the statements of the railroad company. I examined it and found it somewhat defective, and this morning the Secretary sent me a statement as respects the accounts of the Panama Railroad Company, showing its receipts and expenditures for a year past, I think by months, and giving also the debt, etc. So we have now a full statement of the condition of the railroad company.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest to the Senator that he had better have it printed as a document, so that those who want to continue the debate to-morrow can use it. We have intimations here——

Mr. ALLISON. That is a good suggestion. I ask to have it printed as a document, as well as in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the communication will be printed as a document in addition to being put in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will yield to me a moment more, I wish to say that yesterday I stated the debt of the Panama Railroad Company at a much larger figure than it is. It is less than $3,000,000, as shown in the statement which I have had put into the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. Including the recent loan referred to——

Mr. ALLISON. Including the recent loan.

Mr. LODGE. Of six or seven hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. ALLISON. Six or seven hundred thousand dollars, but not including the contract made between the Canal Commission and the railway company as to the double track.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have seen a copy of the contract in the documents here, and it has appeared to me rather a remarkable transaction, as I said, with the Canal Commission adjourning, and, without going out of the room, acting as directors of the Panama Railroad Company. It is very much like we used to do in South Carolina in some political days that I recall. The Alliance would hold a meeting and pass resolutions and adjourn, and the Democrats would then assemble; but nobody would leave the hall and nobody would come in. There was no change of personnel or principle, because we were all white men and were determined upon white supremacy, and were not worrying about any outside influence.

Mr. ALLISON. It was regarded as a proper transaction at the time.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; a proper transaction.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose this will be.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suppose so; but this is governed by law, and that was governed by necessity.

Mr. SPOONER. The trouble is this is not governed by any law enacted by Congress.

Mr. TILLMAN. No.

Mr. SPOONER. If there is any trouble in this respect, it is the fault of the Congress. Congress provided that the United States should buy the property of the New Panama Canal Company, and with it nearly the entire capital stock of the Panama Railroad Company——

Mr. TILLMAN. All of it.

Mr. SPOONER. Not all of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. We did not buy all of it originally, but we have it now.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator did not allow me to complete my statement, which will take but a moment. I refer to the original act and the shares owned by the new French canal company. Since that time it is true the Government has acquired all the shares, and the Government has thereby become the sole stockholder in that great corporation, which owns and operates the railroad. Now, it must have directors. We have made no provision of law as to how the directors shall be elected. It is left to the Administration—to the President for the time being—and it is perfectly natural and indeed inevitable that the members of the Commission should be directors of the railroad company, representing the stock of the United States as far as they go. We have to make some provision for that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not criticising in any adverse spirit the present arrangement, for it, or something nearly like it, will have to exist, as a matter of common sense.

Mr. SPOONER. While it might be improved upon in some respects, it is inevitable. It is not to be criticised.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not criticising it. I simply want the whole subject to be ventilated. Let us get at all the facts and expenditures and see where the money has gone and know what is doing. I do not believe it is the business of the Senate to sit here dumbly and pass laws sent to us without any light being given to us, especially when money is involved. That is my idea of duty. I want to say here that we can not afford longer to do it. These methods are not American, and we ought to go back to old-fashioned methods of legislation.

I am nearly through. I do not know that it is altogether advisable to raise the issue that will be presented in this clipping, which I will have read, but I do not care to have the responsibility for concealments of any kind connected with the construction of the canal, and I do not want to appear to connive at or condone or in any wise approve or indorse certain things that I know the overwhelming majority of the American people will not indorse. I merely present it for the purpose of letting the country realize a phase of the canal building which nobody has ever contemplated or spoken of hitherto, and that will, I am sure, cause the Canal Commission, which is charged with the responsibility for it, to step about pretty lively, to use a slang phrase, in order to explain and defend it.

I send to the desk an article from the New York Herald of November 25, written, I am informed, by the same correspondent whose letter of December 15 I had read a little while ago. I do not know whether I shall have it read or whether I shall have it printed. I understand that several of my fellow-Democrats want to go on with the debate. I will not be here to-morrow. If it is desired, I can briefly outline what the article relates to, and then Senators can have it read if they want. It is in regard to the charge, which I suppose is not denied, that under the authority and direction, and order, I presume, of those who are controlling affairs down there they have sent one of our ships to Martinique and brought a shipload of negro women and distributed them up and down the camps of the railway. It is so near akin to the African slave trade, only it is more infamous, that I would like to have some explanation and justification for it if anybody proposes or is ready to give any. I will read it, I reckon.

Mr. TELLER. Who sent the ship?

Mr. TILLMAN. The engineer, or the superintendent of labor, or some one down there—Mr. Burnett, I think his name is. I will ask to have the article read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. TILLMAN. It begins on the first page and then goes over to the middle of the second page, and is marked with a pencil. It is very salty reading for Christian people.

The Secretary proceeded to read the article, and after having read for some time,

Mr. LODGE. If I may interrupt the reading a moment, I understood the charge to be, as outlined by the Senator from South Carolina, that this cargo of women was brought there in a vessel of the Commission under their authority. It seemed to me such an extraordinary charge——

Mr. TILLMAN. That is what the paper states.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; that is what the paper states; that is all right. It seemed to me such an extraordinary charge to make that I went to the telephone and called up the Secretary of War. I told him the charge that was being read in this paper from the desk, and he said that on his authority I might say on the floor of the Senate that it was a lie. I use his own language.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the article; and, after having read for some time,

Mr. TILLMAN. At the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, let the balance of the article be printed without reading it. It is well understood what the situation is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection the request of the Senator from South Carolina will be complied with.

The entire article is as follows:

[From the New York Herald, Saturday, November 25, 1905.]

CLERGY RAISE MORAL ISSUE ON ISTHMUS—IMPORTATION BY CANAL OFFICIALS OF NEGRO WOMEN RAISES STORM OF PROTESTS—MINISTERS WILL MAKE AN APPEAL—THEY WILL URGE THAT THE BRINGING IN OF WOMEN BE STOPPED AT ONCE—DEFENDED BY AN OFFICIAL—HEAD OF BRANCH OF LABOR AND QUARTERS DECLARES LABORERS WOULD NOT OTHERWISE REMAIN.

PANAMA, PANAMA, November 18, 1905.

The recent importation of 300 negro women from Martinique and the statement that more are to be brought by the Canal Commission officials in charge of the labor branch of the work have stirred up the Americans on the Isthmus, especially the clergymen.

These ministers are shocked and indignant at the course of the officials. They declare the only way to straighten out the whole transaction is to stop bringing in women and to compel those now here to marry or go back.

The canal officials say they are compelled to furnish the laborers with "wives," and point out that ceremonial marriages are almost unknown among blacks in Caribbean lands.

The Rev. Thomas B. Wood, in charge of the American Protestant chapel in Ancon, and a prominent Methodist missionary in South America, said:

"I have heard of this monstrous iniquity, and I make my cry, as they say in Spanish, out of the skies. I had intended reaching the American people through our religious press, but welcome the opportunity of addressing them through the Herald.

CHURCHES WORKING TOGETHER.

"Here all national and church lines are wiped out and all denominations of the Protestant Church work together for general morality. The ministers of the Episcopal Church minister more to the spiritual needs of the blacks than do the ministers of other churches, but they will find us cooperating with them against this labor policy. We are all alive to its awful consequences.

"Not without protest shall we see this Isthmus turned into a free-love community, for that is what it means. When that protest is heard by the ten millions of Methodists and the six millions of Baptists in the United States there will be no uncertain response. Exposure of the facts should raise such a storm of indignation as will maintain our national decency on the Isthmus as it is maintained by our Government at home.

"Are we to have a sewer of moral degradation because we want a canal? That is what this policy will produce. I have heard it has been advanced that it is necessary. There is not the slightest need of it. Think of the degradation to our country! The eyes of the world are focused on us and what we are doing here.

"Our ability, our honesty, our Protestantism, is on trial. Particularly are the eyes of the South Americans watching us. From us they are beginning to draw their inspirations, held back only by those who teach them we are loose in our marriage vows and that the United States and its religion do not stand for moral purity.

"If the importation of these women is not stopped by a great popular demand started by our churches, these people and the world at large will conclude that we stand for all that is vile, and the evangelical work of years will be undone."

REGARDED AS A REPROACH.

The Reverend Mr. King, of the British Wesleyan Church, said: "It is inconceivable that American officials should bring these women here without requiring them to marry. Their living in a state of free love in Jamaica has been felt by all the English churches to be a reproach to the country, and the strongest possible efforts have been made for years to get them to marry. The news that they are being taken to an American colony and allowed to continue their obnoxious custom will be received with sorrow and amazement in England."

The same sentiment was expressed by the Reverend Mr. Eskins, rector of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, of Panama, who added: "The Martinique women could not have been brought here in such numbers, no matter what the ascribed reason may be, without a knowledge of the great harm that must result. It is an awful mistake."

To the protest of the clergy is added an equally strong objection by the physicians from the standpoint of public health.

BROUGHT BY THE SHIPLOAD.

In order to keep the negroes at work on the canal the Commission, through its branch of labor and quarters, sent agents to Jamaica and Martinique to bring to the Isthmus as many negro women as wished to come. They were offered free transportation with board on an American vessel and the promise of food and quarters until they could provide for themselves.

There was no trouble in Martinique in getting together 300, and they arrived at Colon on the steamship Floridian a few days ago.

Negro laborers along the canal were greatly excited when they heard the women were coming. Work was generally deserted, and thousands flocked to the wharf days before the Floridian was due. The steamship's appearance in the bay started a riot. The men fought with one another for advantageous positions on the dock.

OFFICIAL CLAIMS TRANSPARENT.

As a matter of form the women were told to point out their "husbands," but the officials themselves tell many a story of how women were given out that shows how transparent is the claim that any serious effort was made to allow the men to take only those women whom they had left behind in Martinique, and how fallacious the promise that other women who accompanied these so-called married women would be put to work in American families.

If a woman after talking with a man asserted she was willing to become his wife, they were permitted to leave the dock together, without even a promise that they would be legally married.

Much the larger portion of the cargo of women was put aboard the cars and distributed along the line. A few who asked for work were given it in the Commission hotels, but others were left at various camps "in proportion to the size of the camp." The pretense was that they might find work in American families.

In Bas Obispo there are ten American families, several of which had servants. They were left eighty of the imported women. The laborers there number 300. The proportions were the same at all the camps in which the women were left. Quarters were given them and they were fed as long as they remained in them. One of the officials said yesterday that nearly all were already mated and off the Commission's hands.

LIKE DARKEST AFRICA.

A man writing from one of the camps to the Herald correspondent says: "Before these women were brought here we had an orderly and quiet community. The night they came it was awful, and since then I feel I am living in darkest Africa. If I can not get a transfer I shall send my family back to the States. I can not allow my wife and children to remain in such an atmosphere.

The importation of these women and others to come is warmly defended by Henry Burnett, who, in the absence of Jackson Smith, is acting chief of the branch of labor and quarters. Mr. Burnett has shown much ability in working out the problem of furnishing food and quarters for white as well as black labor. He has clean-cut features, a frank manner, and impresses one as an able and practical man. When asked what excuse there was for bringing these women to the Isthmus he replied:

"No excuse. It was the only thing we could do to keep our laborers here. Anyone who has had any experience with the West Indian negroes knows they won't work any place without their women. What has been done is always done by all employers of such labor on great works. We were losing fully a third of ours, and we had to stop it. The men said if their wives were brought over they would be more contented.

"There was great need of servants by American families and in the Commission hotels. The Martinique women are cleaner in their habits and make better servants than those from Jamaica. So we decided, as we had about 2,000 Martinique men here and will have more, we would begin by bringing over their women.

AFTER WOMEN IN JAMAICA.

"An agent was sent to tell those who had men on the Isthmus, and those who did not have, but who wanted work, that they would be brought here free and given food and quarters until they were settled. Three hundred have come. We have an agent in Jamaica now who will allow every sixth laborer to bring his wife with him. Every third foreman is granted the same privilege. It's the only way we can get them."

"Don't you consider their relations immoral, and don't you know that the people of the United States may object to the continuance of such relations on its soil under the sanction and by the act of its Government?" Mr. Burnett was asked.

"I can't see why they should," responded Mr. Burnett. "We are down here to build this canal. What have the morals of a lot of West Indian negroes got to do with it? I assert that they are not immoral in preferring to live with a woman without a marriage ceremony. They may be unmoral—that is, without morals as we understand morality—but they are ofttimes truer to the women they select than our people, who have a ceremony performed.

"Not one in a thousand or five thousand of the natives of those islands or in Central or South America gets married. They can't afford it. Marriage to them means a great and expensive ceremony, complete wardrobe, and a well-furnished house. They won't marry without all this.

MARRIAGE CERTIFICATES UNNECESSARY.

"We ask them to come over here to work for us, and they ask us to send for their wives. It is decided to do so. All I require as the acting head of the branch of labor and quarters is that a woman says such a man is her husband and I give her to him. It isn't for me to ask for a marriage certificate.

"There may have been some mistakes, but so far as we are able we have seen to it that only the men who have been living as husband and wife at home are allowed to obtain possession of any of these women.

"I have heard that some of the men took the tickets given them with the names of their wives, selected others who could not read, told them it was an order for them, and took them away. The tickets, I hear, were in some instances retained and passed around among laborers who had none and who played the same trick. These cases will be investigated and straightened out."

Here is a case coming under my personal observation which may or may not be typical:

Rose Montrose, who is darker than the darkest queen in Africa, was found sitting on the porch of one of the houses set apart for laborers in Bas Obispo. There were many other women about the camp wearing the gay turban of the Martinique, laughing and chattering with all the abandonment of the French West Indian. Rose's face was sad; she took no interest in the others' gayety. It was a refined face, and the contempt that flashed from her eyes and the haughty curl of her lips made it striking and strong.

ROSE MONTROSE'S STORY.

"What's the matter?" she was asked. "Don't you like it here?"

"No. I came for work," she replied, "but I see it was not for work I was brought."

"Who brought you here?" was asked, "and what were you told?"

"The people who are building this canal brought me here from Martinique," she answered. "I was born on the British island of Dominica, but I went to Martinique to get work. There I was told by the man who was getting women to come here there was plenty of work here, and so I came, but it seems it was to choose a man I was wanted. But I shan't do it; I will starve first."

The girl's story was that on arrival on the Isthmus she was sent, with other women, to Bas Obispo, ostensibly to be given work in an American family. Days passed and no one came to tell her where to go or what to do. Finally she appealed to a Zone policeman, who told her to choose a man, as the other women were doing. She indignantly refused to follow this advice, and it was supplemented by the warning that if she did not observe it she would be thrown out of her quarters.

"And what shall I do?" inquired Rose. "I can not do as they say."

"Rose," asked Sanitary Inspector Davies, who had come up while she was talking, "are you a good girl and do you really want work?"

The earnestness of her reply satisfied the inspector, and Rose was engaged at once. A report this evening from Mr. Davies says she has taken hold of her duties with an ardor which indicates that she really wanted work, and will make an excellent servant.

An American who has lived many years on the Zone says several natives went to him with the statement that they understood the United States was selling Martinique women for $25 each. They offered $50, and could hardly be made to understand that the story was not true.

It is currently reported that several Martinique negroes obtained two or more of the women, and have sold them to their fellows for from $8 to $12 each.

Most Americans in the Canal Zone are incensed and humiliated by what is going on around them. Their sense of decency is offended and their pride in their country deeply hurt. They can no longer point to it as a model when questioned by Panamans, whose amusement over their discomfiture is apparent.

Mr. TILLMAN. After the emphatic denial of the Secretary of War I shall be only too happy if it can be shown that no such disgraceful condition exists there. But I contend that they must investigate a little. This is not the Philippines, and we can not take offhand statements from men in the War Department, however emphatic the language or however high the station, as covering the whole facts, until we see whether it is so or not.

Mr. LODGE. The statement, as I understood it, was that these women were being brought in Government vessels.

Mr. TILLMAN. The statement is that a ship—it does not say a Government ship—was sent to Martinique, and the head of the labor bureau there, Mr. Burnett, whose name is mentioned, has been said to state that it was necessary.

Mr. LODGE. That they were being brought under Government auspices?

Mr. TILLMAN. Being brought under the Canal Commission's auspices, under his auspices.

Mr. LODGE. The Canal Commission's? That I understand the Secretary of War to deny absolutely.

Mr. TILLMAN. I shall be only too happy if his statement proves to be true.

Mr. LODGE. Against an anonymous newspaper statement I prefer for the present to take the statement of the Secretary of War.

Mr. TILLMAN. I prefer to take his statement, where he knows it to be true. I do not prefer to take his statement in this case without at least having somebody else given an opportunity to investigate the matter. Mr. President, I have only a few more words. I have trespassed much longer on the patience of the Senate than I had anticipated or desired to do. The debate ran off on various branch lines that I had not expected it to take, and there have been a great many things brought out which may be necessary or valuable. A great deal of it probably is of no use to anyone. But my sole purpose was—

First, to emphasize the necessity for the Senate of the United States to take its share of responsibility for the control of this great work, and so legislate as to protect the Treasury from any embezzlements or stealing.

Second, it was to call attention to the fact that by reason of our negligence, or from other reasons or other influences which may have governed us, we have given an excuse for what I believe to be Executive usurpation. If I have in ever so slight a degree been able to call attention to some things which need defense and explanation, and so cause a thorough and searching investigation into the canal affairs, I will have accomplished all that I set out to accomplish.

During Mr. TILLMAN's speech,

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, before that article is read, while I dislike to do so, I would ask the Senator from South Carolina to permit me to offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas offers a proposed amendment to the pending bill, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Congress," on page 3, in line 22, it is proposed to add the following:

Provided, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be used to pay the expenses of a literary bureau connected with the Isthmian Canal Commission, or pay the salary, compensation, or allowance, by whatever name called, of any person who may be engaged in such work for or in behalf of said Commission.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

After the conclusion of Mr. TILLMAN's speech,

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, it seems evident that we can not complete the bill to-night. Several Senators have expressed a desire to speak briefly on the subject, and if I can have an understanding that a vote shall be taken to-morrow, which is very important, I will then ask that the bill may be laid aside for the moment, and I shall move an executive session.

I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be completed at the session to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the pending bill be completed at to-morrow's session.

Mr. LODGE. That it be voted on before adjournment.

Mr. ALLISON. Before adjournment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That it be voted on before adjournment. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PAY OF OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES.

Mr. ALLISON. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 48) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1905, on the 20th day of said month. I ask unanimous consent that it be now considered.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I will take the liberty of making another motion. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 15, 1905.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. POLLARD was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Regular Army retirement (H. R. 12306, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session), no adverse report having been made thereon.

Also, by unanimous consent, Mr. POLLARD was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Nebraska State Militia (H. R. 13561, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session), no adverse report having been made thereon.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and pending that I would like to get some agreement for unanimous consent for limit of debate. I will ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] if we can not agree this morning on some time for limiting the debate?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think there will be no trouble about that. I have no anxiety as to continuing the debate.

Mr. PAYNE. There are some gentlemen who want to be heard on both sides, and I think if we say an hour and a half it will be sufficient.

Mr. HEPBURN. It will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. MANN. Why not make it a little longer than that?

Mr. PAYNE. Say two hours; an hour on a side.

Mr. MANN. I think it ought to be longer than that. There are a number of gentlemen that want to be heard.

Mr. HEPBURN. Let us make it two hours.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word about this. There are several gentlemen over here who want to make speeches, and people who want to make speeches want to make them, and this is just as good a chance to make them as I know of, or that will come up at this session.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] wants fifteen minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He has that time, and you can not take it away from him. I think that the debate ought to be extended.

Mr. PAYNE. I think that if we have two hours on a side, to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and myself, it will be sufficient.

Mr. MANN. Why not agree to vote at 4 o'clock?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Make it 5 o'clock.

Mr. PAYNE. I dislike to take up the whole of this day. It keeps the Committee on Ways and Means here, and they have an important engagement with a gentleman from a distance.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from New York will permit me, we will endeavor to relieve the committee to-day, so that they will have more time hereafter.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that I am informed by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House that a number of gentlemen have appealed to him for time, and want to speak on this subject.

Mr. PAYNE. I will not make any suggestion for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. What is the request of the gentleman?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I do not make any request in view of the opposition here.

Then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of resolution No. 42, relating to the distribution of the President's message.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the question of what committee the reference to insurance contained in the President's message shall be referred to is an important question, but it is an insignificant one in comparison with some of the other matters that it necessarily brings up.

It is my purpose this morning briefly to discuss what may be called the "technical question" of what committee that should go to, and then to voice a protest against the tendency indicated in that part of the President's message relating to insurance and other great corporations.

We have had curious arguments made by the chairmen of two committees of this House. The chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce desires that this reference shall be to his committee and desires it by a vote of the Committee of the Whole in order that the House may go on record as declaring that Congress should have jurisdiction of all the great corporations that happen to do business outside of the lines of the State creating them. He said that in so many words yesterday.

On the other hand, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means presents to the House this peculiar proposition, that inasmuch as we can have nothing to do with insurance except by virtue of the taxing power—a proposition to which I agree—therefore we should disregard the moral obligation that is placed upon Members of this House and should use the taxing power immorally, to do what it was not intended the American Congress should do—that is, enter the domain of the police power that belongs to the States.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman does not attribute that position to me, does he?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am attributing this position to the gentleman, that if his argument meant anything at all it meant, as I understood, that the House had no jurisdiction over the question of insurance except by virtue of the taxing power.

Mr. PAYNE. That is correct.

Mr. SHERLEY. That therefore it should go to the Committee on Ways and Means, the committee that has jurisdiction of matters raising revenue; and the intimation was—because I would not assume that the gentleman desires to refer it to his committee for the purpose of smothering it; I am assuming that he wants to be fair with the House and that he proposes the House shall consider the great question—that when he desires a reference of it to the Ways and Means Committee he desires it sent there for the purpose of using the taxing power so as to affect insurance.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman's intimation is for him to make, of course. I made no intimation of what my position was on the subject, otherwise than it was the only jurisdiction that the House had.

Mr. SHERLEY. You desired it to go to that committee, as I understood you, for the purpose of enabling the House through its taxing power to legislate.

Mr. PAYNE. I made no intimation of what that committee will do, or of what I myself will do. I merely stated the law of the House as it was, that it should go to that committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman say to the House whether he wants it to go to that committee for the purpose of pigeonholing it, or whether he thinks that committee will be justified in legislating?

Mr. PAYNE. "The gentleman from New York" does not make any proposition with reference to that, other than what he has already stated.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am willing to let the gentleman's position stand as he stated it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LITTLEFIELD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

An act (S. 1169) for the refund of certain tonnage duties; and

An act (S. 1475) to provide that the 2 per cent bonds issued under section 8 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, shall have the same rights and privileges that are accorded by law to other 2 per cent bonds of the United States.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The committee resumed its session, Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania in the chair.

PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman from Kentucky will yield to me, I want to make a motion that the committee rise now, so that the House may consider the matter which has just been reported in the message from the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. PAYNE. I am sorry to interrupt the gentleman, but he has just begun, and I want to move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Kentucky declines to yield, the Chair is of the opinion that the motion of the gentleman from New York would not be in order.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask the gentleman to yield for that purpose.

Mr. SHERLEY. As soon as I get some information perhaps I will yield. I do not desire to embarrass the House, but it is hardly fair to take me off my feet when I have but begun my argument. I should like to know what time the House will consume in the consideration of this subject. Mr. Chairman, having learned the purpose of the request, and with the understanding that I have a right to the floor when we go into committee again, I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that the committee do now rise.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I think the rest of the House would like to know what the programme is on this subject.

Mr. PAYNE. The House will know in a moment, if the gentleman will allow us to rise.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. It may be too late then.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the gentleman from New York has been recognized to make the motion.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House resolution 42, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PREROGATIVES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1475) and offer the following resolution, after which I will ask to have the bill read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up from the Speaker's table the following Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1475) to provide that the 2 per cent bonds issued under section 8 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, shall have the same rights and privileges that are accorded by law to other 2 per cent bonds of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That the 2 per cent bonds of the United States authorized by section 8 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, shall have all the rights and privileges accorded by law to other 2 per cent bonds of the United States, and every national banking association having on deposit, as provided by law, such bonds issued under the provisions of said section 8 of said act approved June 28, 1902, to secure its circulating notes, shall pay to the Treasurer of the United States, in the months of January and July, a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent each half year upon the average amount of such of its notes in circulation as are based upon the deposit of said 2 per cent bonds; and such taxes shall be in lieu of existing taxes on its notes in circulation imposed by section 5214 of the Revised Statutes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill S. 1475, in the opinion of the House, contravenes the first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution, and is an infringement of the privileges of this House, and that the said bill be taken from the Speaker's table and be respectfully returned to the Senate with a message communicating this resolution.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to discuss this resolution at any length, as the matter was fully discussed at the last Congress, in reference to the agricultural appropriation bill, which came over here with a revenue amendment attached by the Senate. On that occasion the precedents were stated to the House, and on a yea-and-nay vote only three or four gentlemen voted against it, and that because of their doubt as to whether the bill really contained a revenue clause or not. The bill was sent back to the Senate, and the Senate acquiesced in the decision of the House, and withdrew the amendemnt from the bill. Now they send over here a bill which is purely a measure of taxation. They propose that the 2 per cent bonds to be issued for the construction of the isthmian canal shall be taxed the same as other bonds for which provision of law is made that they shall be used as a basis for the currency of the national banks. They reduce the tax on those bonds to be sure, but the bill authorizes a tax. This is a tax bill pure and simple. The Constitution has provided for the origination of these bills in the House of Representatives. The framers of the Constitution thought there was a reason for this. The House has contended immemorially, they have always contended that they have the right, and they have asserted the right time and again to institute revenue measures. They have the only jurisdiction in the Congress of the United States where these measures may be originated. Therefore, I ask the House to adopt this resolution; and in that connection I do not care to take up the time of the House by debate now. I may desire to extend my remarks citing some of the precedents; but the Constitution is so familiar, and this clause of the Constitution is so familiar that I do not think it is necessary for me to recite them for gentlemen to vote intelligently upon this resolution. [Loud applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, this comes to me rather suddenly, and is rather an astonishing thing. I saw in the morning papers that the Senate had taken this action, but I thought they had taken it en route to settlement and the passage of a bill "for the construction of an isthmian canal." This matter comes back entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal," etc., but there is nothing in it at all except a provision for putting certain bonds in another class; and in my opinion it is undoubtedly a violation of the privileges of this House, as given to it by the Constitution of the United States. [Loud applause.] I believe that the position taken by the gentleman from New York is correct, and I think we ought to pursue either the course suggested by him or some other course that would indicate our opinion to the effect that it is a breach of the constitutional privileges of the House. I see no objection at the first blush to the resolution as read:

Resolved, That the bill S. 1475, in the opinion of the House, contravenes the first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution and is an infringement of the privileges of this House, and that the said bill be taken from the Speaker's table and be respectfully returned to the Senate with a message communicating this resolution.

Mr. PAYNE. If there is no debate upon this question, I shall ask for a division, in order that we may have a rising vote and a count on this subject. I do not care to ask for the yeas and nays, but simply call for a division.

The question was taken on agreeing to the resolution; and on a division there were—ayes 357, noes none.

So the resolution was unanimously agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. PAYNE. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House resolution 42, and the gentleman from Kentucky is recognized.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is never pleasant to find one's self in the position of Mahomet's coffin, suspended between heaven and earth, but I was very glad to yield the floor that this committee might rise, in order that the House might maintain its constitutional rights. It is so seldom that a member of this body has a chance to protest against the constant disregard of the constitutional rights and dignities of the House that I am always willing to yield the floor for any such purpose. [Applause.]

To return to the subject of discussion, I know of no more immoral practice than that which has grown up in the House of Representatives of using the taxing power for other purposes than the raising of revenue. It may be that in other countries the taxing power has been necessary as the weapon of liberty, either by denying appropriations or by taxing particular things, but in America the theory of our Constitution has been, and still is, that through other means the liberties of the people are guaranteed, and the taxing power was given only for the purpose of raising revenue. So, when you find upon this floor serious discussions of the reference of a bill to the Ways and Means Committee, upon the implied, if not the openly expressed, opinion that the taxing power shall be used not for the purpose of revenue, but for the purpose of doing something that otherwise Congress could not do, and that it was not intended that Congress should do, I, for one, propose to protest. Therefore, I am opposed to the reference of this matter to the Ways and Means Committee. I am also opposed to the reference of it to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. It is conceded by the distinguished chairman of that committee that the Supreme Court will have to change its mind in order for this Congress to have jurisdiction under that clause of the Constitution. He enters the domain of prophecy and says that they will do it. It may be that he agrees with Mr. Dooley, who, in the discussion of the insular cases, said to Hennessy that he was in some doubt as to whether the Constitution followed the flag, or the flag the Constitution, but it was evident that the Supreme Court followed the election returns. [Laughter.]

It may be that he considers the clamor now being raised throughout the land for the regulation of insurance companies by the National Government will have sufficient effect that, in the event of national legislation, the Supreme Court will sustain it and overrule itself. About that he may be a better judge than I am, but it is apparent to every Member on this floor that the discussion had for the past two days shows that it is the overwhelming judgment of the House that, as the Constitution is now interpreted, we have no such jurisdiction; that if we are to legislate on this subject, we must discover some other provision of the Constitution than the commerce clause.

Now, we have a great committee in this House, a committee that not only reports bills for legislation, but is also the judicial adviser of the House. The Committee on the Judiciary is supposed to be made up in its membership of the ablest lawyers in the House. They are there for the purpose of not only originating legislation, but they are there for the purpose of instructing the House upon questions of constitutional power. What more proper than to do what the Senate has done, make reference of a matter of this kind to the Judiciary Committee, that they may report back to the House whether, in their judgment, this House has jurisdiction, and if it has jurisdiction, the extent of it. Shall we determine now that one or the other of these committees may have this matter without a proper investigation? If the House is to now determine that fact, then, on the knowledge that the House has of the decisions of the Supreme Court, it ought not to refer this to any committee, because this House knows that it has been expressly declared that there can be no interstate commerce in insurance. Of course it can be reached collaterally, but isn't it a humiliating spectacle, isn't it such a spectacle as has been responsible for a whole lot of trouble in America, that men sworn to support the Constitution, representatives of a great body of the Government, are willing to disregard its plain limitations, and by subterfuge, under the taxing powers, do that which in their hearts they do not believe they are entitled to do? The fact that the House has done it, the fact that we have got precedents for it, only makes it worse. It only shows how one thing leads to another. The other day a statement was made in the other branch of the National Legislature that that provision in the law creating the Bureau of Commerce and Labor, relating to insurance, crept in there without the knowledge of that body; that had they had knowledge of it, there would have been a pronounced protest; and now we have a marked illustration of the danger of a precedent.

The President of the United States in his message says that because Congress has given to the Bureau of Commerce and Labor the power to make certain general investigations and inquiry as to insurance, therefore we have presumptively declared that it is a matter proper for national governmental control, and that declaration is used as a lever to make us go a step further. I understand that some member of the Judiciary Committee will offer an amendment referring this matter to that committee, and I hope that that amendment will prevail.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to turn from this discussion of a narrow proposition to the discussion of a broader one. I believe the House will bear me out in the statement that I have never taken a partisan, captious position on the floor. I do not propose to do it now, but if I should let pass by in silence certain portions of the President's message without a protest, I should consider that I had no reason to be upon this side of the aisle, that I ought to go over to the other side. If I am to assume the position that seems to be taken by some, of out-herodding Herod, then I propose to go into Herod's camp where I can do it effectively, and not remain outside of it. I want to protest against that modern theory so pronouncedly and ably stated in the President's message that because a thing is big therefore it must come within the national jurisdiction. It is true that this whole country has been stirred from one end to another by the disclosures in regard to life insurance. It is also true that every one of those disclosures have been made known to the public by State agency and not by the National Government. It is true that the Supreme Court of the United States in deciding the case of Paul against Virginia, in deciding the cases that followed after that, plainly indicated that the States had complete—not only complete, but exclusive jurisdiction over the subject. Yet we have sent us a message saying that the time has arrived where it is evident, in the judgment of the people, that the States can not manage these things and that we must come to the National Government.

The President in his message says:

> The fortunes amassed through corporate organization are now so large, and vest such power in those that wield them, as to make it a matter of necessity to give to the sovereign—that is, to the Government, which represents the people as a whole—some effective power of supervision over their corporate use. In order to insure a healthy social and industrial life, every big corporation should be held responsible by, and be accountable to, some sovereign strong enough to control its conduct.
> The makers of our National Constitution provided especially that the regulation of interstate commerce should come within the sphere of the General Government. The arguments in favor of their taking this stand were even then overwhelming. But they are far stronger to-day, in view of the enormous development of great business agencies usually corporate in form. Experience has shown conclusively that it is useless to try to get any adequate regulation and supervision of these great corporations by State action. Such regulation and supervision can only be effectively exercised by a sovereign whose jurisdiction is coextensive with the field work of the corporations—that is, by the National Government. I believe that this regulation and supervision can be obtained by the enactment of law by the Congress. If this proves impossible, it will certainly be necessary ultimately to confer in fullest form such power upon the National Government by a proper amendment of the Constitution It would obviously be unwise to endeavor to secure such an amendment until it is certain that the result can not be obtained under the Constitution as it now is. The laws of the Congress and of the several States hitherto, as passed upon by the courts, have resulted more often in showing that the States have no power in the matter than that the National Government has power; so that there at present exists a very unfortunate condition of things, under which these great corporations doing an interstate business occupy the position of subjects without a sovereign, neither any State government nor the National Government having effective control over them. Our steady aim should be by legislation, cautiously and carefully undertaken, but resolutely persevered in, to assert the sovereignty of the National Government by affirmative action.

And again:

> The great insurance companies afford striking examples of corporations whose business has extended so far beyond the jurisdiction of the States which created them as to preclude strict enforcement of supervision and regulation by the parent States. In my last annual message I recommended "that the Congress carefully consider whether the power of the Bureau of Corporations can not constitutionally be extended to cover interstate transactions in insurance."
> That State supervision has proved inadequate is generally conceded. The burden upon insurance companies, and therefore their policy holders, of conflicting regulations of many States, is unquestioned, while but little effective check is imposed upon any able and unscrupulous man who desires to exploit the company in his own interest at the expense of the policy holders and of the public. The inability of a State to regulate effectively insurance corporations created under the laws of other States and transacting the larger part of their business elsewhere is also clear. As a remedy for this evil of conflicting, ineffective, and yet burdensome regulations there has been for many years a widespread demand for Federal supervision. The Congress has already recognized that interstate insurance may be a proper subject for Federal legislation, for in creating the Bureau of Corporations it authorized it to publish and supply useful information concerning interstate corporations, "including corporations engaged in insurance." It is obvious that if the compilation of statistics be the limit of the Federal power, it is wholly ineffective to regulate this form of commercial intercourse between the States, and as the insurance business has outgrown in magnitude the possibility of adequate State supervision, the Congress should carefully consider whether further legislation can be had.

The President's reference to the reasons that controlled the makers of the National Constitution in framing the commerce clause is, I suggest in all humility, not historically accurate. The fact is, the convention of Virginia and Maryland was called—the convention that led up to the subsequent convention which adopted the Constitution of the United States—for the purpose of trying to arrive at some method of settling the conflicts that arose as to the commerce on the rivers and waters that divided those two States and to arrive at some method by which States would not be able to hamper and handicap the commerce of other States. As a result of that convention came the national convention that adopted the Constitution. Now, the commerce clause has two provisions in it. They are in the same sentence, but they are distinct in the sense that they were put into the Constitution. One of them relates to the power of Congress over foreign commerce; the other relates to the power of Congress over interstate commerce. It was desired at that time that the United States of America might have a weapon that she might use against England, who was then fighting her commerce on the high seas. It was expected that the United States of America should use its power through that provision against other nations, but that part of it which relates to the States was put into the Constitution for the purpose of preventing the States from discriminating against the commerce of their sister States. It was put in there for the purpose of keeping commerce free, not for the purpose of shackling it. Yet to-day, and for many years past, it has been made the pretext for giving power to the National Government to hamper and control. Now, I trust I am not a man who looks backward. I hope I am not speaking of the tender grace of a day that is dead, but I do feel that half of the evils that confront the country to-day confront it because we have disregarded the fundamental theory of our Government. I believe the way to govern best is not only to govern least, but to govern as near as possible at home. [Applause.]

That is my kind of Democracy. That is the reason I am where I am. If we could make the people of the States realize that of necessity under the Constitution 95 per cent of the things that relate to life, liberty, and property belong to the States, and unless we change the organic law must remain with the States—if we could make them realize that therefore they must make their own State governments effective in order to deal in nine cases out of ten with those matters that affect life, liberty, and property, we might hope to solve our problems. But what has been the result? Largely as a heritage of the civil war, largely as a result of the acceleration that was given to the national power due to the emergency that that conflict brought about, we have had the spectacle that whenever a condition requiring a remedy arose in a State, the people, instead of trying to solve it there, come to the National Government and undertake to have the power under the Constitution stretched so as to bring the matter within the national domain.

The people, simply because the National Government seemingly acts, think that it always acts better. They think it acts better because they know less about its actions. They get a knowledge of what it does simply from the men who do it. The newspaper accounts which go out nine times out of ten necessarily go from the very source that has done the act which is to be reviewed by the people. Naturally the report going out is favorable, and they get the notion that if the action is by the National Government it will be better action. Maybe it is better, but, gentlemen, there is no reason why it should be as good. There is not a power contained in the Constitution of the United States in regard to most questions arising that is not contained in even greater measure within the State. Tell me that States composed of millions of people, bigger than some of the great nations of the world, are not able to have proper officers, capable of proper legislation, solving these problems, and what is equally important, capable of enforcing the law! I will not admit it.

This tendency toward centralization has gone on until, from having started out a hundred years ago in fear of the Executive, we have become afraid of the legislative bodies; from a fear of the National Government, to now a total disregard of State power. The people have a distinct contempt for the State legislatures, and they have more or less contempt for the National Legislature. It has become so that a member of the State legislature has to almost prove aliundi that he is an honest man and a man of good ability. Gentlemen, you get the service you expect. The people have restricted them; they have hampered them. Recent State constitutions have restricted the meetings of the legislatures to once in two years. They have restricted that meeting to sixty days or some short period. In a special session they are restricted to considering what the governor desires shall be considered. All these are indicative of the fact that the people are fearful of these bodies. The result is we have brought on this floor great questions not properly here, and we have to spend nine-tenths of our time in determining not what we ought to do, but how we can do it. If the theory of the National Government being not only supreme, but all embracing, if the theory as voiced by the President in his message is right, then I for one agree to the suggestion made in that message when he said that if we can not do these things, if we can not take charge of this insurance matter, we ought to amend the Constitution. I go further and say that if we are going to attempt this and similar things, if we must take care of them here, then I am in favor of abolishing State government. I would a great deal rather see this body dealing with what it should do instead of always having to consider whether it can do it. That is common sense. If this idea of concentration is right, if centralization of power is right, then let us go on and carry it out. It is true we will be giving the lie to the theory which has prevailed in America since the beginning; it is true we will be running in the face of Anglo-Saxon history.

If it is true the time is coming when we are to have such power not only given the National Government, but are also to have given to the executive arm of the Government the right to handle everything under the sun, from football up, let us abolish the State government outright and make a clean job of it. Look how this idea of centralization is working right here among us. Look how it is working with the two bodies of Congress. One body, because it was smaller and because it had in a sense executive power, in that it could pass upon Presidential appointments, has grown and grown, until to-day this body is practically ignored, and we had the spectacle a few moments ago of that body, in plain contravention of the Constitution, undertaking to pass a bill that only could originate here. It is simply a further tendency toward centralization. You are not only concentrating the States out of their power, but now you are beginning to concentrate the different bodies of the National Government out of theirs. Against that, as a Democrat, as a believer in the history of my nation, I protest. It is for this reason I have taken advantage in this body when the President's message was up for discussion to voice my protest. I had been in the hope that some man abler than I, some man longer in the service of the House, might have felt called upon to do it, but in the absence of that I felt I should be untrue to those motives which actuate me, to the position I occupy in this House, if I did not protest.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Does the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I have enjoyed the address so far very much, but I wish to ask the gentleman if it is not true, in his judgment, that gentlemen from the Southern States—Democrats from the Southern States—have a marked tendency to yield up their ideas of State rights in order that their States or their districts may get some benefits or emoluments out of the United States Government? Is not that the marked tendency with Democrats in the House?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman has asked me a frank question. I will answer it frankly. It is true that in the past the ark of the covenant of local self-government has rested among the Democrats of the South. It is true to-day, unfortunately, that there are some of them, breaking the traditions, as I conceive them, of the party and of the country, who have wandered away after the fleshpots of Egypt. But, gentlemen, what is true in one instance on this side of the House is true in nearly all instances of that side of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is my answer to the gentleman.

I realize that in a large measure I stand in some particulars alone on the floor even as a "voice crying in the wilderness." I realize that the American people, from having been a very sober people, slow to form an opinion, have become a mercurial people, with opinions over night. I realize that in men's memory history goes back to the last edition of the paper of the day before, and their view of the future goes forward to the first edition of the day after. I realize that any clamor that happens to be loud enough may not only get the ear of individual Members, but it may get even the ear of the Executive of the nation; and because there is now a clamor we have sent to us a message saying that we must try and find a way in and out of the provisions of the Constitution to do certain things, and then if we can not do them we must do away with the Constitution in order to do them.

The messags makes the surprising statement that the States are unable to control insurance. On what theory is that made? Does not every man know that if you had the right sort of law, and, what is better still, the right sort of enforcement of the law, in the States that the power exists there to control insurance and control nine-tenths of our other troubles?

The President speaks of the fact that overcapitalization is the worst evil in connection with big corporations. Does not every man who is the least of a lawyer know that it is in the power of a State that creates the corporation to prevent overcapitalization? It can put all of the restrictions upon it that it pleases.

Now, it may be a sufficient answer to you—it is not a sufficient answer to me—to tell me the State has not done it. I say what we must do in this country is to awaken the people to a realization of that power at home; demand that a man shall exhaust the power that is given to the States before he comes to the nation. Why, if the President's theory is true, then there is not a city in the Union that should not be put under the control of the State government, because they have all been notoriously badly managed. Now, if the fact that they are badly managed, if the fact that the people of the city do not manage them right, do not elect the proper sort of officials to the common councils, is sufficient reason, then by a parity of argument the State should take control of the cities, and you should have them managed by your legislatures and the governors of your States. You only need to examine the proposition to see how it strikes at the fundamentals of this Government. Take the history of England and see what has been done in her city governments. It is true that Parliament is all powerful, and always has been, but it is also true that there is more local government there to-day than there is here, despite our boast. They send men of the highest ability to the common councils of their cities; put in men capable of occupying any position in any legislative body, and as a rule all of these cities are efficiently and capably managed, and they do not need to appeal to Parliament.

If the cities and the States should send into public life the right sort of men, making it worth while for a man to be independent, and keeping him in his position when he does show independence—if they would do that, you would find nine-tenths of the questions that trouble the Government would no longer be sent up here to trouble us. Every man in this House knows that the size of this House, the amount of business that comes here, practically prevents real judicial consideration of questions. [Applause.] The day has gone by when the House of Representatives can intelligently do affirmative work. There is no man here but who in his heart of hearts knows this to be true. What has been the result? You send important measures to a committee; you put into the hands of a few men the power to bring in bills, and then they are brought in, with an ironclad rule, and rammed down the throats of Members, and then those measures are sent out as being the deliberate judgment of the Congress of the United States; but no deliberate judgment has been expressed by any man. Now, if you are going to bring in additional to that other problems that you think should receive consideration, where are you going to end? Will it not have a tendency to end altogether in a government of bureaus? No man that will be frank in the statement of his opinion but knows that that is true. We all admit and we all admire the ability of the President; we realize his purpose is a high and lofty one, and yet we permit ourselves to sit silent, voicing no protest against a message to Congress that contains more of centralization than any other message that was ever written to the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will it disturb the gentleman if I make a suggestion or two along the line of his argument?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not at all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Has the gentleman from Kentucky considered in his evident study of this question how you would establish two jurisdictions, two supreme authorities—one supreme in the State and one supreme in the United States—so as to administer in the form of regulation or taxation or prescription the duty of a corporation, it being an instrumentality of the States in some industry or in any other branch or business, so as to have both jurisdictions operating upon that corporation at the same time; and would it necessarily in the long run oust the State jurisdiction absolutely and put the whole power in the General Government? I am on the side of the gentleman; I am a Democrat in the matter of the rights of the States to control their own local institutions, and have always been so. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SHERLEY. I am glad to have such able support, and in answer to the gentleman's question I will also try to be as frank as the gentleman was in propounding his question. No lawyer—no real lawyer—who has ever advanced beyond the mere citation of cases and gone into the philosophy of the law but what knows that the problem offered by a dual system of government is one of the most difficult problems ever offered to a people. And a further difficulty in that problem has been caused in large part by the extension of national control to the exclusion of State control, because of the temporary inefficiency of State governments. But the main idea that I wish to convey is this: Not that we do not realize the great inherent difficulty, that we do not recognize that there are many questions that lie on the border line of the jurisdiction of the two governments, questions about which men must differ and about which the courts have differed, and that when these questions come up it must follow that one or the other of these governments will get the jurisdiction to the exclusion of the other, according to the trend of the times, and frequently the practicability of its dealing with the question, but that as to those things that are clearly within the State's power and can be controlled by the State, that when no effort is made by the State to remedy the evil that that neglect should not be made an argument and an excuse for this Government, the National Government, entering the domain. Now, here is a practical illustration in the insurance matter. Here is a matter that has come to the attention of the people—this corruption, this wrongdoing—by virtue of a State investigation. Our States are just beginning to awake to a long-neglected duty, beginning to investigate and to formulate laws to control the situation. I undertake to say that if persevered in the States will be successful. The condition arose simply because the States have been neglectful of their duties in the past, and now we are told that we should, in advance of any results growing out of the States' activity, take the matter from them, notwithstanding the evil that inherently follows an entrance by the National Government into the State domain. It is not only true physically and mentally, but true governmentally, that a power unused becomes weakened and will in time be destroyed.

Let any part of the anatomy of man cease to be exercised and used and that part goes into decay until it finally disappears. Let the quality of local government, let that power which rests in the States, fail to be used; let the people forget that they have in their own hands the power to remedy evils; let them forget that after all it depends upon the moral atmosphere of the people themselves, their desire to enforce the laws that they pass—let them forget that and come constantly to the National Government for aid, come up here away from the place of the evil, and you will find that the ability to solve problems at home will die because of disuse. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Gentlemen, we make too many laws; we enforce too few. The trouble is that out of hypocrisy, out of cant, which seems to be a part and an attribute of the Anglo-Saxon, we are willing to pass laws that we do not believe in. There comes a clamor, and we yield to the clamor for fear of our jobs, and we put the law on the statute book when we do not think it ought to be there. Even although it remedies a particular evil, we know that it carries in its train many other evils. Then having put it there we wink at its being ignored. Why, gentlemen, we pass every year numerous temperance laws and then permit them to be dead letters, because we have been cowards and were afraid not to pass them, and yet do not want them enforced. If the people will enforce the law, if we can have the enforcement of the law against the high as well as the low, we will solve many of our problems without any need for new legislation. Nothing has come out in the insurance investigation that the State of New York can not handle, and most of the problems can be handled on the criminal side of the law docket. [Applause.] It is a question whether the people of New York will have the courage, but if they do not have it that is no reason why we should take up their burden. We must send back word to them, "You must solve your problems at home. If you do not do it, they will not be solved." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. In a colloquy with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] yesterday the following occurred:

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman tell the House how many members of the American Bar Association voted on that resolution?

Mr. BARTLETT. I have not the minutes of the American Bar Association.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it not a fact that only a very small minority voted on it at all?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not know. I know of a committee of five appointed by the American Bar Association to investigate and report on it. Four reported in favor of regulation and one against.

I wanted to ask the gentleman the source and extent of his information on the subject. I have information from a gentleman who was at the meeting of the American Bar Association during the whole of its session, and he reports to me that when it came up the president ruled it out on the ground that it was not accompanied by any proposed bill, as provided by their by-laws, and without a dissenting voice the report went out, and no vote was taken at all upon the subject at the meeting of the American Bar Association. I will ask the gentleman if that information is correct?

Mr. SHERLEY. My own information is not definite. I will say to the gentleman that I have the honor to be a member of the American Bar Association. I attended one of its meetings, and while there I saw matters of very great importance that happened to interest some particular member of the association brought into that body, and by the advocacy of that member, nobody else having thought or cared about them one way or the other, the approval of the body was put behind them. So that without meaning to cast disrespect upon a very great organization, I do consider that in the absence of something affirmatively showing that the matter was considered at length by its membership, inasmuch as only a very small minority ever attends its meetings, its action is not entitled to such great weight as to determine the position of this House.

Mr. PAYNE. I did not understand the gentleman as to whether he was there and could say that a vote was or was not taken.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I was with the distinguished gentleman on the other side of the world. I was not at the meeting this year.

Mr. PAYNE. I see. I think you will find that no vote was taken; that it was ruled out by the president.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Kentucky concluded his remarks?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. I desire to reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BARTLETT and Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Georgia that he promised to recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to interrogate the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if it is necessary, I yield to the two gentlemen sufficient time for the colloquy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky, as I understand, reserves his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman reserved his time.

Mr. SHERLEY. I did reserve my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BARTLETT. I merely want to say this in answer to the question asked by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. I did not undertake to say yesterday that I was present at the meeting of the Bar Association, of which I am a member and have been for years, but I stated that the newspaper account of the proceedings before that association contained a statement of the majority report of the committee, which I hold in my hand—a committee appointed at a previous meeting of that association to consider the question—reported to the bar association and that it adopted. That is what I stated, and all I intended to state. I do not want the gentleman from New York or my friend from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] to understand that I approve of the majority report; on the contrary, I stated that I did not, and that my views were very different from those contained in the majority report. I agree with the minority report as to the constitutional right to regulate insurance business.

Mr. PAYNE. I did not understand that the gentleman from Georgia intended to state that he was present. I supposed, of course, that he spoke simply from report, and I thought he was misinformed. Now I have given my authority, and the gentleman and I have no difference on the subject.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I have been unable to satisfy myself as to the effect of the proposed amendment to the pending resolution, upon the jurisdiction of the Committee on Ways and Means. I have always regarded resolutions distributing the subjects contained in the President's messages as somewhat perfunctory in their character, and not as affecting in any degree the jurisdiction of the several committees as fixed by standing rules of the House, and I would so regard the pending resolution, except for the fact that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has made it an important issue. He has announced, in support of his amendment to the resolution, that there is no power in the Federal Government to regulate or control the business of insurance excepting through the power of taxation, and if his amendment prevails it will be tantamount to a decision on the part of the House that he is right, and it will be notice to the country that the House of Representatives has decided that it has no control over the subject of insurance excepting through the taxing power.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. DALZELL. Does the gentleman mean to argue that if the House should send this subject to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that would be an implied judgment on the part of the committee that insurance is commerce?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. In effect it might be; it would imply at least that the judgment of the House was that insurance might be interstate commerce. Now, if it were not for the argument made by the gentleman from New York in support of his amendment I would not take the position I do. In my opinion the amendment of itself does not bear any such jurisdictional significance as he attaches to it, but in view of the position he takes and the issue he makes, we must meet it.

My position is that in view of the argument and the grave questions presented by it the House is not ready yet to determine that there is no power in Congress to regulate insurance by any other method than taxation. The House is not ready yet for the final decision of that question, and, in my judgment, while the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is insisting that the subject be referred to that committee, and the Committee on the Judiciary contends that the subject ought to be referred to that committee, I say, "A plague upon all your houses." The reference of this subject is in a large matter a ceremonial matter. Leave out the amendments altogether and pass the resolution in the form the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee first proposed it, and allow the Speaker a free hand to refer bills to the appropriate committees, according to their character and provisions, and not in pursuance of any implied direction in a resolution distributing the subjects connected with the President's message. That would leave questions unsettled. No question would be decided, either directly or by implication, and it would leave the Speaker entirely free in the reference of bills and resolutions upon this important, this vital, this current question in American politics and morals.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If this were referred to the Judiciary Committee, would it not eliminate the elements of controversy and fail to indicate any implication on the part of the House?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It would have that effect; a reference to the Judiciary Committee would be a colorless reference, a reference without significance in a sense.

Now, I might with equal propriety, Mr. Chairman, insist that this subject ought to be referred to the Committee on the Census——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Oh, the gentleman does not really think that as a serious proposition?

Mr. CRUMPACKER (continuing). The committee of which I have the honor of being chairman, because the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor in his recent report recommends that the Director of the Census be authorized by legislation to collect statistics respecting fire insurance, marine, and life insurance. If the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] prevails, following the custom of the authorities in the House referring bills or resolutions, I suppose legislation of that kind would have to go to the Committee on Ways and Means. I have in mind the reference of a bill in the last Congress, a bill extending the coastwise laws to the commerce of the Philippine Archipelago. That bill in no wise modified or changed the navigation laws of the country. It in no wise affected the coastwise business of the United States proper, but it affected simply the commerce of the Philippine Archipelago. It merely extended the navigation laws to the situation there, and I took the position before the gentleman who had control of references that in view of the fact that it affected the interests and the commerce of the Philippine Archipelago, the Committee on Insular Affairs, which had charge of that business, should have jurisdiction of the bill, because it affected no interests except Philippine interests. But the bill was referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Now, the duty of that committee is to promote legislation to build up and develop the merchant marine. The business of the Committee on Insular Affairs is to support legislation to build up and develop the commerce and civilization of the Philippine Archipelago. I suppose the interests of the merchant marine were regarded as paramount and the bill went to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and that committee reported a bill providing that the coastwise laws of the United States should apply to the Philippine trade on the 1st day of July, 1905, and forever thereafter.

The members of the Committee on Insular Affairs, who at least may be presumed to know something about the peculiar conditions of that archipelago, insisted that the coastwise laws ought not to apply before the 1st day of July, 1909. They were defeated in their position in the House, but an amendment was made fixing the application of the coastwise laws after the 1st day of July, 1906. It is now admitted by everybody in the country who knows anything about the situation that that law must be modified before it goes into operation, else there will be serious disaster to the Philippine commerce and prosperity generally. I cite that example simply to illustrate the custom of references. It illustrates a method that is followed, and that is that where one committee has jurisdiction of a general subject, to refer all bills on that subject to that particular committee. I think bills ought to be referred according to their character. I was very much impressed with the argument of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] yesterday, that bills ought to be referred, as far as possible, in accordance with the dominant purpose of the bill. Almost every bill that is introduced—that is, bills of any special importance—contains a number of features, and might perhaps be referred to one of three or four committees. It is often that legislative measures have a dominant and a subordinate purpose. There may be incidental things connected with bills, but where the dominant purpose can be discovered I think it ought always to control the reference of the bill. Now, it has been suggested in the course of this debate that the regulation of insurance companies could be effected through the mails. It has been suggested that legislation might require all insurance companies in the United States to comply with certain conditions in reference to publicity, and then laws might be enacted preventing companies that refuse to comply with those requirements the privilege of the mails, and thus, indirectly at least, compel insurance companies to submit to the prescribed regulations and conditions. On the other hand, my colleague the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS] has a bill pending providing for regulation of insurance in the District of Columbia, the Territories, and the insular possessions of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, nobody questions the power of the Government over the regulation of insurance in the District of Columbia, in the Territories, and in the insular possessions, and the measure proposed by my distinguished colleague seems to be an entirely practicable one. Should a bill of that kind go to the Committee on Ways and Means? Ought it not more properly to go to the Committee on the District of Columbia, to the Committee on the Territories, or to the Committee on Insular Affairs? Any one of those three committees would have jurisdiction, but the Committee on Ways and Means would not naturally; certainly it would not unless this amendment be adopted. Mr. Chairman, in view of the discussion up to date, it seems to me there is much force in the proposition I made a moment ago, that there ought to be no reference of the subject of insurance to any committee, that the resolution ought to be adopted just as it was originally written, and the Speaker should be given a free hand to refer bills upon the subject of insurance to any committee that he thought they should go to under the definition of jurisdiction in the standing rules.

This could harm no one. The subject of insurance is by implication distributed already. Let me ask, Mr. Chairman, Is not the subject of insurance already effectively distributed? All measures in relation to taxation or revenue go to the Committee on Ways and Means now, without this amendment. If a bill imposing a tax upon the business of insurance in the country should be introduced it would go to the Committee on Ways and Means. All matters in relation to interstate commerce under the rules already go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. If a bill or resolution should be proposed undertaking to regulate the subject of insurance under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution it would go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. All matters in relation to post-office activities already belong to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. If a bill should be proposed undertaking to affect or regulate the business of insurance through the mails that would go to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. So, it is seen, Mr. Chairman, that in effect, without any express declaration upon the part of the House upon the subject, insurance in all its aspects and features is already adequately and satisfactorily disposed of, and by passing the resolution without amendment we will not go to the country as having decided this thing or that. We should not undertake in this manner to interpret the jurisdiction of the committees or to control the Speaker of the House in the reference of bills and resolutions. It is a practical solution of the question, and the only practical solution of the question in my judgment. It would be infinitely better to make no specific reference of insurance, and leave this grave question about the power of Congress to regulate the insurance business, about the power of Congress to use the taxing authority to regulate commerce, these grave questions that have been so ably discussed, to a later day in the session, when there can be a full opportunity for investigation, more time for study, that we may more intelligently dispose of them.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois yields ten minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can contribute very much to this debate, but I do want to emphasize a little what the gentleman from Indiana who has just taken his seat has stated. I agree fully with the position as stated by the gentleman, that bills when introduced should take the regular course and go to the committee properly having jurisdiction. I have examined the message of the President on the subject of insurance, and there is certainly nothing in that part of the message that would suggest that the subject of insurance should be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. The distinguished gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, stated that when he prepared the resolution that he did not include the words "and insurance," which clearly indicates that there was nothing in the message that suggested that the Committee on Ways and Means was the proper committee to have jurisdiction of this subject. He states that one of the reasons why he proposes this amendment is because certain bills have been introduced proposing to cover the question of insurance regulation through the taxing power, and because of that fact all bills referring to the subject of insurance should properly go to the Committee on Ways and Means. He has also stated that it is a rule of the House that when a committee has jurisdiction of a subject, that then all bills relating to that subject, though containing some technical provision which possibly might send them to some other committee, for the sake of uniformity they should go to the one committee. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that his argument in that respect is against his position, for it can not be claimed that the subject of the regulation of corporations is one over which the Committee on Ways and Means has jurisdiction, and therefore the committee having jurisdiction of the regulation of corporations should have referred to it all bills pertaining to that subject. Mr. Chairman, some genius in this House might prepare and introduce a bill covering all the different phases of the question of regulation of railroads. There would be in that bill the rate question. There might possibly be a provision reaching the refrigerator or private car lines through the taxing power of the Government, and if that provision was in such a bill then, under the logic of the gentleman from the State of New York, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, that bill should go to his committee, and because that bill went to the Committee on Ways and Means then, in order that there might be uniformity, all other bills relating to that subject should be referred to that committee. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what purpose the Committee on Ways and Means has in proposing this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois yields five minutes additional time.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is very apparent, Mr. Chairman, that the purpose of the committee was to get control and get jurisdiction of the subject of insurance, and certainly in view of the distinguished gentlemen who compose that committee I would in no way cast any reflections upon their motives.

We know that, whatever motives prompted them, they were honest in suggesting it to this House. We know, Mr. Chairman, that recent investigations have developed the fact that insurance companies have spent large sums of money, if we can believe the reports, in having representatives in attendance at the legislatures of the different States for the purpose of influencing and preventing legislation. Some one might say that possibly one of these representatives, while on his way to some State capitol where a legislature is about to convene, stopped off at Washington and quietly suggested to some friend the committee that ought to have referred to it any bills that might be introduced upon the subject of insurance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we do not believe that that occurred. We have too high a regard and too much respect for the membership of this committee to believe that they would in any way be improperly influenced or affected by any suggestion. But we do find in the remarks made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that the subject did not occur to him, and it did not until suggested by some member of the committee. I submit that the Committee on Ways and Means has no jurisdiction of this subject, that the rules that we have are sufficient to govern what shall be done with bills that may be introduced in this House, and that this amendment or no other is necessary at this time. Let the bills take their regular course and go to the committees that properly have jurisdiction of them.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL].

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, the people of this country are perhaps as interested in this question as in any which has arisen for a long time. Relatively a few people are interested in railroad legislation, but a majority are directly or indirectly concerned in life insurance, and therefore concerned in the action of Congress in this matter. In my judgment Congress should not be foreclosed by any action at this time by referring all bills pertaining to insurance to any one committee. The Ways and Means Committee has jurisdiction of every bill the primary object of which is taxation, but no such bill will pass. For while the people are interested in controlling, regulating, and purifying the life insurance of our country they are not in favor of taxing those companies or their business, for the reason that the policy holders would have to pay the tax.

For greater reasons, in my judgment, those bills should not be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It has been held that marine insurance is not commerce. Now, if marine insurance is not commerce, what can be said in favor of the claim that life insurance, accident insurance, fire insurance, employers' liability insurance, elevator insurance, rent insurance, mercantile accounts insurance, and many other forms of business now classified under the head of insurance, are commerce? It will not be asserted by any man that transactions of this character are commerce, and therefore no valid claim can be made that they should be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Many bills have been introduced and others will be introduced which the Committee on the Judiciary will not claim should be referred to them, and the same applies to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

But there is another idea, simply a suggestion, which I would offer for the consideration of this committee. I quite agree with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that there is a marked tendency of late toward paternalism, or paternal government, and I am not a strong advocate of that form of government. I agree with him that the central Government is growing stronger day by day relatively to the strength of the several State governments. Every dollar spent for canals, every dollar spent for irrigation, every dollar spent for the improvement of rivers and harbors, every rural delivery carrier started on a route tends to enhance the power of the National Government relatively to the power of the governments of the several Commonwealths. But this argument does not apply especially to the Republican party. There is a marked tendency on the part of gentlemen, Members of this House, Democrats from Southern States, to surrender the doctrine which they inherited from Calhoun and to abandon their ideas of States rights in order that they may get a little pork in the barrel, or that they may get some benefit from the central Government for their several States or districts.

The Democratic party in the State of New York only a few years ago introduced a plank in its platform for ownership of the anthracite mines. On the 7th of last November a Member of this House on the Democratic side ran for mayor of New York on a municipal-ownership plank and received a very large vote, and possibly on a fair canvass and honest count he was elected. I say possibly because I venture no opinion as to the merits in that contest. There are in our country many advocates of Government ownership of railways, telegraph and telephone lines, and, in short, in favor of governmental or municipal ownership of all property employed in the production and distribution of the necessaries of life. The signs of the times all indicate that there is a marked tendency toward paternal government, and I do not know of any business where paternalism would be as wise or beneficial to the people as in life insurance. This is offered merely as a suggestion. It may come up as a matter of serious consideration by and by. With the central government as the life insurance company, as the underwriter of all policies, all the expense of the vast competition which is now being waged between the several companies would be saved. Those expenses are very heavy. The commissions and other expenses in securing new insurance are very large. As a result the cost of insurance in the great life companies is nearly as much again as it ought to be. It is nearly as much again as the real risk would justify. If the expenses of competition and the extravagance and waste in those large companies were eliminated, insurance could be sold for about one-half what it costs now, because not more than one-half the income is paid out as actual benefits for loss.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] yield to his colleague, Mr. COCKRAN?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yes.

Mr. COCKRAN. Does the gentleman include among expenses of insurance the wholesale swindling testified to on the part of officers at recent investigations?

Mr. DRISCOLL. No. I do not include the enormous salaries. The swindling has been indirect largely. I do include, of course, the large salaries all along the line in those companies.

Mr. COCKRAN. Would the gentleman make a distinction between this and ordinary swindling?

Mr. DRISCOLL. There was swindling; but, aside from the salaries, it does not appear in the companies' reports. I now refer to expenses that are accounted for and are reported in the books of the companies. They are very large; much more than they should be, and therefore the insurance is very expensive to the policy holders. If the Government were the insurance company such legislation would do away with the agents all over the country and with the officers who are drawing large salaries, and would eliminate the expensive competition which now prevails. Every individual could get his insurance directly from the Government. There would be no solicitors or agents, and people would take no more than they could afford. Many people are of sanguine temperament. If they are doing fairly well they think the good times will continue. They are often persuaded to contract for more insurance than they can carry when fortune turns against them a little. In such cases they must surrender their policies at considerable loss. Under this system insurance would necessarily be cheap, the security sound, and payment in case of loss certain. There are political economists who say that the government which sells the largest amount of bonds to its own people is the most stable government. If bonds have a tendency to make a government durable, how much more would insurance accomplish in that direction? Relatively few people buy such bonds, while the majority of the people are directly or indirectly interested in life insurance, and every such person would be concerned in keeping the government sound and permanent.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I was interested in what the gentleman stated, and I notice that the gentleman said that the expenses of the companies were unnecessarily large, and I suppose he probably refers to the three great companies located in New York?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to be advised whether the insurance superintendent of New York has made any recommendation as to what are the legitimate expenses and as to a reduction that should be made.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The superintendent of insurance of the State of New York commenced an investigation of the Equitable Life Assurance Society last spring, and I happened to be the counsel in that investigation, which really started this convulsion which has spread all over the country. He investigated into the expenses incurred in the management of that company and made a report on that question.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have read the report and had it in my room, but I do not remember that that report included a suggestion with reference to the reduction of expenses.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I am not sure that it did.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What I wanted to get at was whether the superintendent of insurance had made any specific recommendation in that respect.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I do not think he did.

Bills or resolutions may be introduced in order to give the Government power along the lines of this plan of insurance, and certainly such bills or resolutions should not be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, nor should they be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I quite agree with the gentlemen who have preceded me that we should not foreclose ourselves at this time by referring all bills and resolutions on the subject of insurance to the Committee on Ways and Means on the theory that the only way of getting jurisdiction of this insurance question is by the taxing power of the Government. Nor should they be referred to any other one committee, but the reference of each bill and resolution should be determined by its own provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

[Mr. MANN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, this debate has taken a range far beyond a mere question of procedure in the House. It has touched a most important question of Federal jurisdiction. It has done more. It presents a question affecting the very existence of republican government and our power to take effective action for its preservation.

A most interesting contribution to the discussion has just been concluded by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. With the object which he had in view I sympathize most heartily. The method by which he pursues it I think is open to question. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has bemoaned the decline of State governments and the decay of representative bodies, including this one—two features of our evolution which I believe to be ominous in the last degree. But the gentleman says that he is opposed to any use of the taxing power as a means of enforcing authority by this House over important questions affecting the public welfare. So far as I could understand his argument, he stated that while this taxing power had been the effective weapon by which representative bodies had established their authority in the past, for some reason or other not made quite clear to me, and I fear not quite clear to the House, it was not proper or judicious at this day to invoke it for the preservation of the authority which had been established by its exercise. I have observed through all this discussion on the part of gentlemen who have opposed the reference of this question to the Committee on Ways and Means a disposition to treat the taxing power of this body as though it were a mere power conferred by law on some city or village government to levy an assessment for the support of a municipal department. It is important and, I think, essential to remind gentlemen that this power of taxation vested in the House of Representatives by the Constitution is the weapon by which all the importance of legislative bodies has been established.

If the conception of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and other gentlemen who have spoken on this subject be correct, then that provision of the Constitution which places in our hands the exclusive right to originate revenue bills is a mere idle expression—superfluous, meaningless, unimportant. Sir, I do not believe any line of the Constitution is either superfluous or meaningless. There are weighty reasons why that power has been bestowed on us. Sir, I think anybody familiar with the debates in the convention where our Constitution was framed will concede that through all the discussions it was assumed that this body would always be the important feature of our Government, and its importance in the judgment of the framers was assured when the taxing power was placed in our hands. If we are but a board of aldermen to decide whether the rates levied to support some city or village government should be 1, 2, 3, or 4 per cent on the assessed value of all its property, then the power to originate revenue bills might have been placed at the other end of the Capitol without in the slightest degree affecting the importance of this body. But, sir, because all the successful battles for liberty have been fought with that weapon, it was intrusted to us by the wise men who established this Government, in the belief that privileges which heroes had won in the field patriots would conserve in the council chamber. That power of taxation we have a right to exercise absolutely according to our own discretion. As we use it our consequence and our dignity will stand in the structure of our Government. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] bemoans very properly the fact that legislative bodies have sunk into contempt while the body at the other end of this Capitol, which has some share of executive power, has risen steadily in importance, and he assigns the reason for it correctly. The reason is that the Senate of the United States exercises to the full every function and power the Constitution has placed in its hands. Every day witnesses not a recession or concession, but a new and further assertion of authority. Only this morning we in this Chamber felt bound to rise unanimously and declare that this last intrenchment of our power, this exclusive right to originate revenue bills, should not be broken down without at least a protest from ourselves. Yet the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], while recognizing and, indeed, deploring the growth of the Senate and bemoaning the decay of the House of Representatives, tells us in the same breath that he disapproves any use of the one power, the one weapon, by which our consequence can be established.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. COCKRAN. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. I differ simply because I do not believe that is the only power by which the House can assert its dignity and do not think the makers of the Constitution intended it should be the only power.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I supposed, of course, that was the gentleman's view or he would not have made the speech he did upon the floor, but the fact remains that he has bemoaned the waning dignity of this body and he has deplored, or, I believe, criticised, the growth of the other. My object now is simply to supply an explanation of what he considers a calamity and to suggest a method by which it can be repaired. With singular force he declared that powers which are not exercised are powers which are declining, that powers unused are perishing powers. The power to arrest our decay and reestablish our consequence is ours, yet that is the power which the gentleman even now declares is not a proper or legitimate one to be used in maintaining our authority and our dignity. While that power is vigorously asserted there is no subject within Federal control on which we may not exercise the dominant influence, aye, sir, that we were not intended to dominate by the framers of our Constitution. The mere grant of this exclusive right to originate revenue bills shows that we were intended to be the principal feature of this Government. If we have declined and decayed, it is not for lack of power, but through failure to exercise the powers which are ours. The power of the English House of Commons theoretically is very little. Theoretically it is vastly inferior to that of the Lords; practically it is paramount through its control of the purse. Under the feudal system representative bodies had no power except the right to levy taxes. They had no right even to consider any other question unless it was expressly submitted by the sovereign through officers of his own selection and household, known as "lords of the articles."

The gentleman deplored a recent tendency of State constitutions to limit subjects which State legislatures can consider when called in extra session to those which the governor might submit to them. You see, sir, there is nothing original in personal government. There is nothing original in the forms by which distrust of popular government seeks expression. That tendency, which the gentleman deplored, is but a revival here in this land of the power exercised through lords of the articles under feudal institution, when the sovereign treated the legislature, parliament, or council simply as a body whose advice he might ask on certain matters, but whose authority, except upon taxation, he did not concede. The power over the purse alone was always conceded to the representatives of the people; and yet upon this slender foundation the stately structure of the British House of Commons has been erected, which dominates the entire English system, and which furnished the framers of this Constitution with a model for the establishment of this body.

Mr. SHERLEY. May I interrupt the gentleman again?

Mr. COCKRAN. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it not true the use of the power over the purse was in respect to appropriations, and not to do an arbitrary and unconstitutional thing?

Mr. COCKRAN. No, sir; the gentleman must study history a little more carefully. On the contrary, the power which was used most frequently and most effectively was the very power of which this House has deprived itself by special rule, the power to impose conditions on appropriations, to impose taxes on domains, privileges, monopolies, and other features of their political system which they considered dangerous to the prosperity or the liberty of the citizen.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman know that the National Government has no police power and it has been so declared, and does the gentleman not believe that the use of the taxing power for police purposes is unconstitutional to-day?

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I am not conceding that this is a police power. The gentleman undertakes to anticipate the point at which I am aiming, and being doubtless innocent of the course of reasoning which I am pursuing, is naturally ignorant of the end which I seek to attain. [Laughter.]

I trust the gentleman will possess his soul in patience and at the end of a very few minutes he will understand precisely the character of the proposition which I am seeking to establish. I say, Mr. Chairman, that this body uow possesses sufficient power to establish its consequence and its predominance if we choose to exercise it. There is but one change, one amendment that in my judgment could possibly increase its efficiency in legislation or its capacity to defend itself, and that concerns simply the term for which its Members are elected. Where a Member is chosen practically for two sessions and by the operation of our constitutional system one session must be held after the election of his successor, it necessarily happens that the very day on which he takes his seat upon this floor and begins the discharge of his duties he is at once thrust into the throes of a contest for reelection. No man can perform his duty here wholly and efficiently when every day his mail is charged chiefly with information, representations, remonstrances, and appeals that concern not the public business at hand, but the prospect before him in his own district. [Applause.] If this democratic body is ever to acquire and exercise the measure of power which the builders of this Government believed it should possess in order that this constitutional system may be safe and prosperous, there should be at least one or two sessions in which Members could devote themselves to their public duties free from the distraction of a campaign for reelection. Apart from that there is no effective power the Constitution could bestow on us that it has not already bestowed when it gave us the taxing power.

If we have no importance, it is not because we lack power, but because we have put away the great power which has been conferred upon us. And strange as it may seem, the gentlemen who are the most solicitous about the Constitution, the gentleman who describes that instrument as the sacred ark of the covenant—I think I am using the exact words of my friend from Kentucky—condemns as vicious a use of its most important feature, the one on which depends the importance of the body of which he is already a distinguished member and certain in the near future to become one of its most brilliant ornaments. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the suggestion which I would like to place before this committee is that there are various provisions of the Constitution which may be invoked to deal effectively with the abuses grown out of the maladministration of these insurance corporations. But before we consider the remedy which should be applied, let us for a moment consider the nature of the difficulty which confronts us. I believe that on any subject fairly within the authority of the Federal Government—any subject over which the Federal Government has jurisdiction—this House has the right to exercise the taxing power in any way it pleases for the maintenance of its own authority and the enforcement of its own views as well as for the general welfare of all our citizens.

For no other purpose was the taxing power—the right to originate revenue bills—confided to us. I am perfectly willing to admit that we should not undertake to establish jurisdiction by extending arbitrarily the taxing power into fields not properly belonging to the dominion of Federal authority.

Mr. SHERLEY. How does the gentleman explain the case of Dewitt?

Mr. COCKRAN. I beg the gentleman will not interrupt now by asking me to explain special cases. I entreat the gentleman to realize that, after all, he is but one Member of this House, though probably the best among us all, and I am addressing a collective body of which at least 250 Members are present, I can not in the course of this discussion meet every possible difficulty that may arise in the gentleman's mind. If he will allow me to finish, and make note in the meantime of any question that he chooses to ask, at the end I will be glad to spend an hour or two hours in cheerful and, I hope, improving colloquy with him. [Laughter.]

Now, a more important matter, Mr. Chairman, than satisfying the scruples, or shall I say attempting to follow the interesting speculations of the gentleman from Kentucky, is a definite statement of the precise question presented to this House.

We have heard much about the difficulty of dealing with the matter of insurance. From the beginning it seems to have been assumed that the existence of large corporations, each prosecuting its business in several States, and all the corruption and vice in the management which have recently been laid there, are in some way or other inherent in every insurance system, and that the only reform possible is to provide some means of regulating them. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] pleads for a State regulation; the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], if I understand, pleads for a Federal regulation. Now, I think it is possible to exercise the power of this General Government so as to remove completely the conditions which have produced the sinister fruits of corruption which we all deplore. If that can be accomplished, then it is clear no regulation of a Federal character anyway will be necessary or advisable.

What then, Mr. Chairman, is the question before us? I believe that it touches the very existence of republican government. I believe that the continued existence and growth of these institutions are absolutely inconsistent with the safety of republican government in any State which charters them or any State in which they operate, and that the Congress of the United States, whether by exercising the taxing power or otherwise, is bound to deal with them by section 4 of Article IV, which makes it a duty of the Federal Government to guarantee a republican form of government to every State in the Union.

Mr. Chairman, do gentlemen present understand fully the operation of life insurance under existing conditions? Here are corporations possessing enormous funds, whose wealth must necessarily continue to grow rapidly and steadily and whose possessions can never be distributed. Three companies in the city of New York possess assets amounting to a billion and a quarter of dollars. Half of that enormous wealth has been created within a span of time only one-half as long as my own memory covers. It is no exaggeration to say that in the course of a few years, if this system be tolerated, those companies will control from three to five billions of dollars. These three companies have been administered for a long time on a perfect understanding between their managers, and under the pressure of existing conditions there is little doubt that they will soon be controlled by a single hand.

Now, here is a peril to republican government which can not be exaggerated. It is a feature of government in every State, an essential feature of its juridical system, that property shall not be allowed to grow and accumulate indefinitely by being tied up in any form or under any condition. Every State takes precautions to insure the distribution of property by prohibiting any suspension of the power to alienate it beyond a fixed and limited period. In our State property can never be tied up for more than two lives actually in being. In every other State some provision of kindred character has been established. Yet here we have already a billion and a quarter of wealth controlled by three men and certain in a short time to be concentrated in a single pair of hands. In the course of a very short time—not one generation—we will see five or six billions of dollars controlled by a single man. And this vast sum, which can never be distributed, must, in the nature of things, grow from year to year.

Now, such a system, I submit to the committee, must sooner or later produce conditions absolutely inconsistent with republican government. Suppose an individual were able to accumulate such an enormous fortune as that, and suppose by the use of it he were able to dominate our markets, regulate prices, control all means of transportation. Would he not become a power stronger than any State government? But, sir, the very employment and investment of such vast funds would force him to assume such powers and to exercise them. He could hardly avoid, if he would, taking the Government into his pocket, or at least into his hands, and threatening, as we have already seen, a powerful insurance officer threaten a rival with the use of it as a club to beat down opposition. If a single individual were found owning property to an extent that made such an exercise of power possible, would not the ingenuity of every statesman, of every thoughtful man, be exercised to find some means of changing the conditions under which such a peril had been developed? Yet, Mr. Chairman, if these vast funds were the property of an individual owner he would be under the restraining influence of possession, the fear that by any abuse, or even a display of his power, he might risk its security and perhaps its total loss. But, sir, it is the most serious feature of this evil system that these large funds are in the control of men who don't own them and who have little, if any, personal interest in them.

Now, I ask gentlemen of the committee to consider a moment this condition. In the city of New York alone three companies closely connected hold $1,250,000,000, and that fund can not be distributed. It will not be distributed. It must continue to grow, and it is held and controlled at the disposition of men that have really little or no interest in its safety or honest investment.

This condition alone, if there were no other vicious feature of the system, would suffice to make it incompatible with republican government. But that is not all. Every State in the Union, as a necessary precaution for its safety, provides that trusts can be established under its laws only for certain strictly limited and clearly defined purposes, and one feature that runs through them all, without exception, is that no trust can be tolerated where the cestui que trust can not see for himself the manner in which his trustee discharges his duty.

Here are funds amounting to one billion and a quarter—trust funds—and the cestuis que trust can not tell how they are invested or employed until through chance a legislative investigation shows that they have been largely made to flow in channels of crime and corruption. Mr. Chairman, either of these vicious features, both of which violate laws and principles considered fundamental in every State, would make the system dangerous to republican government. Where they coexist—where a huge fund, which is steadily growing, can not be distributed, and where that fund is a trust the execution of which can not be scrutinized by the cestuis que trust, the system is absolutely and inevitably inconsistent with republican government. Republican government, to preserve its own existence, must destroy such a system or the system will first corrupt and then strangle republican government. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I submit to the committee that there is but one remedy for this abuse. The conditions which have preceded it must be uprooted. You can not regulate anything so inherently vicious as this. The features of the system which have made it vicious must be overthrown—destroyed root and branch. What objection can there be to this? I am not now discussing the precise method by which a remedy should be applied. I merely ask, Is there any reason why these great insurance companies should not be restricted to guarding and prevented from wasting the economies of citizens by restricting them to the same field of operation which savings banks now cultivate? The huge, sinister growth of these companies comes from their power to do business in several States. Why should not this power be ended by Federal enactment?

At this point I suppose there rises in the minds of many here the question, Has not this growth of assets resulted in cheapening the cost of insurance? If the answer must be in the affirmative there would be grave reason for moving slowly and with great hesitation to change a system which, however evil in some of its features, had yet operated to encourage economy among the citizens by augmenting its profits.

But, sir, the exact opposite is the truth. As these assets have grown, the rates of insurance, instead of falling, have risen. This growth, which has imperiled the safety of the State, has also imperiled and impaired the resources of the insured. I may be asked, Do I advocate here the prohibition of insurance? By no means. I should be the last to advocate any measure that would be calculated to discourage economy or to refuse it every encouragement within the power of the State. But, sir, it is not essential to effective insurance that these companies should be permitted to grow to this enormous size and to extend themselves all over the United States. The remedy is to confine them to each State, as savings banks are confined to-day.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] spoke of huge expenses, of $150,000 salaries, of an army of agents who are growing rich by soliciting business. All these are but sources of corruption, of crime, of waste, in no way beneficial to the insured. There is nothing about insurance companies essentially different from savings banks. They are very similar enterprises. The savings bank accepts a deposit, pays a certain amount annually for it, and returns the deposit at the wish or demand of the depositor. The insurance company invests not merely the deposit, but its earnings, and when the depositor or insured dies pays the deposit and all it has earned to his heirs or assigns. In each case the essential function is the prudent investment of money.

This is not a difficult or a mysterious function involving any particular skill. The investement of money by the savings banks of the United States has been singularly successful. By figures furnished me this morning by the Department of Commerce and Labor I find that in the United States to-day there are $3,093,077,357 of the savings of the poor. They are properly and carefully invested. By the Insurance Yearbook it appears that the total assets of life-insurance companies in the United States are $2,500,000,000. The savings banks hold funds more than 20 per cent greater than all the assets of the insurance companies. These funds have been accumulated without the aid of agents, without misleading or elusive pretenses of dividends, without paying $150,000 to any president of the corporation. They do not menace the morals, they do not menace the laws, they do not menace the government of any State in this Union. Here is the field to which insurance should be confined. Believe me, Mr. Chairman, this whole investigation shows that a president who draws $150,000 or $100,000 a year is paid that enormous salary not for any peculiar capacity to serve the policy holders, but for peculiar skill and efficiency in swindling them. [Applause.] That is made absolutely clear by the evidence taken on the proceedings before the New York committee.

It is above all in the interest of the insured—the policy holders—that I believe insurance companies should be placed on exactly the same footing as savings banks. But, sir, it is not alone for the safety and welfare of the policy holders, important though they be, that I am concerned. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, the main objection to this system is that it endangers a republican form of government. I have shown you how its operations, even if honestly conducted, necessarily invade two features of the juridical system which every State has deemed essential to its own safety. But, sir, in practical operation these enormous funds, in the hands of men who do not own them, have poisoned the fountains of government, corrupted its administration, imperiled its existence. I have said that it endangers republican government. Sir, it has destroyed the efficiency of republican government in many directions already. What spectacle is it that we deplore? Has it been merely the commission of crime, however heinous? Why, sir, crime occurs everywhere. Crime occurred in High Heaven itself, where the visible presence of the Fountain of all Goodness did not restrain angels from plotting offenses against His Majesty. I do not therefore expect that this earth, or any part of it, will ever be free from crime. But the distressing feature of this spectacle is not the commission of offenses, but it was the avowal of criminality by the criminals, without any apparent consciousness of their own infamy. Before a sorrow-stricken and humiliated community they smilingly mounted the witness chair and cheerfully confessed their crimes, as though they were making professions of excellence. And whither did they go after their confessions were complete? Was it before a grand jury or even before a police magistrate? No; they went back to the very offices where they had practiced their abuses; and the question which men are asking everywhere to-day is not how soon they will be in the penitentiary, but how soon they will condescend to take their hands away from what is left of the treasures confided to them for safety and which they have looted remorselessly. Sir, we are edified now by the spectacle in New York City of the attorney-general and the district attorney working day and night to deliver over to justice men who in small districts have violated the purity of the ballot box. Everyone bids them godspeed. The penitentiary already has received many of those accused. But there has not been one question advanced by an officer of the law to these criminals who have confessed to unblushing perjury and stupendous peculation. [Applause.]

An unfortunate woman who has extracted a ten-dollar note from the pocket of some drunken voluptuary pursuing pleasure in the night is sent to the penitentiary, or is on the road to it, before sundown the next day. These criminals by their own confessions, who have not robbed the vicious and the profligate, but who have robbed the industrious poor of millions, not one of them has been called before a competent body even to explain his infamy. It was only the other day that a negress, who had managed to wheedle a vicious dotard out of some property, was exposed in the public print, and at midnight the officers of the law, the chief prosecutor, surrounded by a gallery of reporters, detectives, spectators, and degenerates, broke down her door with an ax and dragged her triumphantly before the bar of a criminal court, where, I may add, no criminal offense was ever proved against her. Has one of these criminals, whose confessions of infamy were evidently based upon the cheerful assurance that the size of their fortunes gave them immunity—has one of that class found the door of his office battered down by an ax? Has any grand jury been called to consider his robberies? No, sir; we find that the criminals who have befouled their offices have themselves undertaken a "housecleaning," and the law stands by mute and motionless in the presence of this condition against which a popular verdict of bitter condemnation has already been rendered and against which a popular uprising is absolutely inevitable. [Applause.]

Sir, it is idle to call that a republican government where the law is formidable only to petty offenders and helpless or subservient before gigantic crime. Where is that equality before the law which is the very corner stone of our constitutional system, if it is still in existence, when the self-confessed thieves of millions are still enjoying free opportunities of larceny while thieves of small sums are languishing in our prisons? [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am not here to criticise any particular prosecuting officer. Believe me, I make full allowance for the conditions which confront him and confront us. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that there are at this moment resources at the disposal of society sufficient to put any man possessed of eight or ten million dollars in jail. It is a humiliating confession, but it may as well be made. The whole tone, the whole trend of public opinion, is to sit down helpless before vice when it is colossal. We all deplore it, but no man yet has raised his hand to strike where its perpetrators command millions. I ask any gentleman on this floor if this be not the most sinister, if this be not the most ominous, spectacle ever presented in the history of this country?

Mr. Chairman, distressing and degrading though these revelations may be, we have not yet been permitted to see even the surface of these infamies. Do gentlemen know how the majority of these crimes are perpetrated, secure from punishment, and almost from discovery? I can give you some insight into it. You may have wondered why it is that eminent financiers, who seldom have sufficient time to visit their friends or even dine with their families, always find ample leisure to serve on the boards of direction of these eleemosynary companies. The explanation is very simple. Service there was always equivalent to a fortune.

A financier who belonged to a board himself—or whose partner sat on it—which controlled hundreds of millions of dollars had no hesitation whatever in offering to take an entire issue of bonds by another great corporation. If the amount were $100,000,000 he would take them, say, at par, because he knew perfectly well that if he failed to dispose of them at a profit this insurance company with huge funds, in which none of its directors had any personal interest, would be made to take them off his hands on his own terms. But the fact that he was known to have bid for them was generally sufficient to give value to these securities above the bid. It being known, or rather believed, that he was willing himself to pay 100 for them other men of smaller means became eager to buy them at a small advance, and as they bid against each other the price usually advanced to 101 or 102, and thus the whole issue would be sold to the public at such a rate as yielded the enterprising financier between one and two millions of dollars, and this without his being called upon to write a check for one dollar. And of that operation, with its huge profits made through use of funds which this financier had no right whatever to use, no trace whatever appears in the records of the insurance company. It was only in the few instances, where the enterprise failed and resulted in loss, which the insurance company was compelled to make good, that any trace was left by which the original transaction could be established. For every one that failed a hundred succeeded, and thus for every infamy we have discovered one hundred, one thousand, infamies have been perpetrated.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit to this committee—I submit to this country—whether this system of accumulation, unnecessary, unjustified, and unjustifiable, productive of nothing but fraud and corruption, which causes no benefit, but much injury, to the policy holders, which can be profitable to none but thieves, swindlers, and exploiters—I submit whether it must not be terminated by some method or other if republican government is to be preserved. I repeat that I have no desire to check insurance; on the contrary, I want to encourage it, and the best encouragement that you can give it is to make the funds absolutely secure which are embarked in it. It can not promote their safety or their profitable investment when they are intrusted to the control of financiers who have made finance synonymous with piracy. [Laughter and applause.]

Place insurance in the hands of men who realize that the investment of funds is but the discharge of a simple function and you will have your insurance assets grow as have grown the savings bank deposits, without the intervention of agents who plunder the insured or of high-salaried officers who grow rich at their expense. But, sir, some gentlemen may still ask, Is there not some way by which this great business can be preserved, while stripped of its pernicious features? I answer, None in its present extended form. It is absolutely vicious; it is the creation of a trust which can not be scrutinized by the cestuis que trust; it is the creation of a huge fund, which must grow from day to day and can never be distributed, in violation of the fundamental principles upon which the juridical system of every State is built. It yields no result or benefit to anybody except to criminals who exploit it. It must be suppressed, changed, brought within the limits where its operations will be salutary to the state by encouraging economy on the part of citizens without ever threatening the purity of government. Thus, and thus only, can this country escape from the peril which it has developed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as a proof that no special skill is necessary to the effective prosecution of the business of insurance, we have but to look at the method by which these three companies have undertaken to reorganize themselves. What is the first thing they have done? Do they enlist the service of insurance experts? Not by any means. The first thing the reformers did was to send the experts all away. The Equitable Company has been reorganized on a somewhat peculiar basis. A very rich gentleman whom we all have the right, I suppose, to call a philanthropist—

> For he himself hath said it
> And it's greatly to his credit—

[laughter]—has purchased the control of this company and given two millions and a half for stock that can pay him $3,500 a year. That is to say, through philanthropy he has given an earning power of $125,000 for an earning power of $3,500 a year. He is too good a business man to have done that as a matter of commerce. There is no explanation for it except philanthropy. [Laughter.] Now, in order to enlist popular approval for this philanthropic enterprise, what has he done? Has he explored the insurance world for some of this talent which has commanded $150,000 a year or $75,000 a year? By no means. He has gone outside the field of insurance altogether and appointed a kind of financial vigilance committee, and not one of the vigilantes has ever had anything to do with an insurance company except that possibly one of them may have borrowed money from it.

A very eminent statesman, one of the most eminent of our time, has been called from the classic shades of Princeton, where he has been spending the decline of an illustrious life in composing philosophical contributions to the thought of the century, and empowered to select trustees for a company engaged in a business with which, so far as I know, he has never had the slightest acquaintance. Associated with him are two other gentlemen, one who, as I said, may have borrowed money from an insurance company, but certainly never had anything to do with the administration of one, himself a financier of no mean distinction, while the other is a judge, an eminent judge, a judge whose motives nobody will ever question, but who in assuming this peculiar function of a vigilante must necessarily disqualify himself from sitting in a great number of cases which the State of New York had expected him to adjudicate. And to put this reform in practical and efficient operation a gentleman is selected who may have been a good railroad man—I believe he was—and we have the authority of the President for it that he was an excellent Cabinet officer—too good, in fact, to remain [laughter]—and this gentleman, who in the occupation for which he had been specially trained I do not believe could command over $25,000 or $30,000 a year, gets $80,000 to manage a business for which he has had no qualification or preparation whatever. Now, that is reform as the insurance companies themselves conceive it.

In the Mutual we have the very board of trustees whose members had themselves either been active agents in these frauds—who had either been privy to them or who had tolerated them—choosing a new head, and that selection is generally attributed to the influence of a gentleman who has leaped into a peculiar fame through articles published in Everybody's Magazine and which seem to describe him as the triumphant and successful hero of a hundred larcenies. [Laughter and applause.]

In the New York Life its vice-president, after avowals of crime, after swearing on his own oath that he had purchased one day bonds and sold them the next day at an advance of 2 per cent to the company whose interests he was bound to place beyond his own, driven from his post by the indignation of the community, finds himself followed by the adulation of this board, and complimentary resolutions—complimentary to his efficiency in plunder—have been spread through the public press as advertisements paid for out of the funds of the policy holders whom he had robbed.

Sir, remember that we have merely been permitted to glance at these infamies by accident. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] asked, Is it not a State agency that has uncovered these frauds? Sir, the State agency has not uncovered them. It has covered them up, steadily and ceaselessly. The State insurance commission, as is generally believed, was neither a barrier nor an impediment to these frauds. Its head, nominated by the companies themselves, its operation and examinations, in the nature of things, tended not to check, but to facilitate the doubtful enterprises of the officers. The State stood supine. Nay, sir, not supine. Forgive me; it cast actively over these transactions the mantle of concealment, and the whole sickening story became public through a quarrel between the gentlemen who had been enjoying the plunder. A young man whose youth did not fit him for the mysteries of this temple of iniquity was a little too frank and candid for the associates with whom he was thrown. [Laughter.]

They undertook to throw him out not because he was dishonest. That fact would have tended if it existed to bring him close to their bosoms, but they threw him out because he was inefficient in plunder, and in opening the doors to eject him they afforded the public a view of the rottenness that lay behind it. [Applause.] Then and not till then the State reluctantly, slowly, shamefacedly entered upon the field of inquiry, and the result has been the discoveries which have justified this debate here to-day.

Sir, where companies grow as strong, as rich, and so utterly irresponsible as those under discussion, there is no agency, State or Federal, that can control them. When I look back at the opportunities these men enjoyed, when I realize that some of them might have helped themselves to a hundred and fifty thousand dollars a day instead of a hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year, I confess that I can not hold them to have been reckless or extravagant in piracy; I am rather inclined to consider them examples of moderation in piracy. I have no doubt that to-day Mr. Perkins and Mr. McCurdy are both echoing and repeating the pharse of Lord Clive, when he was examined before a committee of Parliament concerning the treasure abstracted from Surâjah Dowlah. After describing his walk through the room in which the vast treasures were stored, the gold and the silver, the precious stones, all piled one over the other, of which he took but £300,000—stole but $1,500,000 when the whole was absolutely at his mercy—he said, doubtless from the bottom of his heart: "Considering my opportunities, by God, sir, I am amazed at my own moderation." [Applause.]

Sir, these gentlemen may well say, "considering our opportunities we are amazed at our own moderation." While these insurance companies are permitted to exist in their present form they will continue to furnish opportunities of plunder, and while these opportunities last they will be abused and perhaps not always with the same moderation. Remember that the lesson of these exposures is not that there is much difficulty or danger in perpetrating similar offenses, but that it was gross stupidity from the criminal point of view which led to their discovery. These malefactors had but to possess their souls in patience, to wait until the young man had been educated up to their own depravity and these crimes would never have been unfolded. [Applause.] What lesson will you teach them now? Will you by a refusal to take effective action for their suppression in their present pernicious form confirm these rapacious officers, or successors chosen by themselves, in the possession of the powers which they have so grossly abused? Will you make these opportunities more secure and more abundant by allowing them to continue under pretense of regulation through some agency, Federal or State, which their billions can always control? Will you restore these powers to them, enlightened as they are now by these experiences which have showed at once the helplessness of government and the power of public opinion? Will you encourage them to greater, more deadly efficiency in plunder by leaving them to use the arts of corruption for the control of public officers while exercising more prudence to keep the public gaze from discovering their iniquities? That, sir, is the lesson which will be taught them if this body take no action to remove this grave peril.

Consider, Mr. Chairman, the demoralization of our civic and commercial life which these exposures have disclosed and which they illustrate.

Everywhere we find a disposition to accept this corruption and this depravity as necessary features of our political system. I see here in the President's message something more significant than that which my friend from Kentucky brought to the attention of the committee. It is the sentiment which dominates all his recent addresses. "There are selfish and brutal men," he says "in all ranks of life. If they are capitalists, their selfishness and brutality may take the form of hard indifference to suffering, greedy disregard of every moral restraint, which interferes with the accumulation of wealth, and cold-blooded exploitation of the weak." Similarly, in Richmond, Va., I think it was, he said that the man for whom he had the greatest contempt was the one who could practice wrong at the expense of his neighbor under protection of the law. Sir, that language is a confession that civilized society has failed to establish any effective means of preventing the commission of offenses by some men against others. I do not believe it is justified. There need not be, there should not be, in a well-organized state power in any man to commit a wrong at the expense of another without punishment by the law being quick and sure upon the footsteps of the perpetrator. When we find such inadequate and fanciful suggestions for regulating rather than preventing crime, I am always reminded of what I think is the besetting weakness of the estimable and admirable character who is President of the United States.

He has a strong affection for the moral law. He wants to keep it constantly before him as the guiding principle of his life, but he commits the fatal mistake of believing that it can be invoked effectively to regulate the distribution of plunder. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Sir, the time and place to invoke the moral law is before the exaction of plunder. If the gratification of greed by perpetration of wrong against morality and justice be once permitted, then to invoke the moral law for its regulation would be like burglars calling upon a policeman to enforce fairness in a distribution of their booty. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There is everywhere apparent, I think it is the sinister feature of our political condition—the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] drew attention to it—a disposition in this country to treat the possession of wealth as presumptive evidence of depravity. In all of our political contests poverty is something of which men boast; the possession of wealth is something that a candidate denies or explains, if he can. And yet why should not the possession of a fortune be a source of honor, credit, and popularity in every community? Why this distrust of success, for the possession of property is the fruit and badge of success? It was not always so. I remember thirty years ago in the city of New York the largest fortune was owned by a man named A. T. Stewart. He was not a lovable character; he was parsimonious, hard, unneighborly; he never built a library; he never wrote a check for a maternity hospital, and yet his fortune, then as large in proportion to those of other rich men as Rockefeller's or Carnegie's is to-day, was not unpopular. It was not assailed or endangered by public hate. It was guarded and fortified by public approval and public support. Why? Because it had been made by a great public service. He was the first person who introduced into the retail trade the principle of one price, so that every man, woman, and child was treated alike who came to his counter. And that system proved so profitable to him that it became the governing plan of every store. The community reaped immense benefit from it, while its originator made an enormous fortune, and the community, mindful of the good he did, respected his fortune as the legitimate monument to the service he rendered his fellows.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. COCKRAN. May I have a few minutes more?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed until he concludes his remarks. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] may proceed until he concludes his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I remember a conversation with perhaps the leading living English philosopher, a gentleman who had visited this country and had written about it very sympathetically. He said: "There is one feature of your political life which I never could understand. There is no country in the world where an idler is held in such profound contempt, and there is no country where the millionaire is viewed with such deep distrust. Now, since the object of industry is to accumulate property, it seems to me that you are traveling in a vicious circle. If you are idle you are despised, and if you are industrious and possess property, the result of successful industry, you are distrusted." Now, there was a good deal of force in that suggestion. It is an extraordinary situation, but it is capable of explanation. The reason why fortunes have become unpopular here in America is that many of them—most of the great ones—have sprung from vile sources and have worked grave mischief to the morals and civic honor of the country. [Applause.]

The American people are not a people of levity. They have not, as my friend from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has said, changed from a careful and sober to a mercurial and thoughtless people. Their intellectual functions are not confined to what the newspaper said yesterday and to anticipating its remarks of to-morrow.

I think the American citizen shows absolute independence of the newspapers' opinion and sometimes considerable contempt for it. I think he reaches his own conclusions with unerring judgment, and the soundness of his reasoning on this matter is a high tribute to his keen perceptions, his indomitable courage, and uncompromising virtue.

Vast fortunes which have been accumulated in violation of law, stand as monuments, not of efficiency in industry, but of ingenuity in swindling and criminality. Some of the largest fortunes in their accumulation have violated the fundamental moralities upon which the safety of our Constitution depends. You gentlemen on the other side have often spoken of a disposition, recently manifested throughout the country, to distrust the judicial department. This is deplorable, but is the fault wholly with the populace? Sir, is the judicial department wholly free from reproach? Why is it that the judicial establishment has undoubtedly become an object of suspicion and distrust; not, I will say, Mr. Chairman, to all the people, but to a very important element in our community? Why, because while it has been singularly effective in maintaining the balance of power between the different departments of Government, while it has been bold and vigorous in maintaining individual rights against disturbance by legislature or executive, or both combined, it has not shown the same vigilance in preventing fraud by capitalists that it has shown in restraining the course of the peace by strikers in labor disputes. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to discuss here the wisdom of the judicial ingenuity by which the operations of courts of equity were extended to criminal offenses. That may or may not have been a great contribution to the security of human society. But I am sorry that while it has been made impossible for any man to run a strike of any extent without getting into jail or without coming into serious conflict at some time or other with an injunction or some other manifestation of judicial activity and vigilance, gigantic fortunes have been made by palpable fraud and open lawlessness without check or hindrance from any judicial authority.

Rockefeller's fortune is a monument of crime. [Loud applause.] He does not deny—nobody does—that it is a product of conspiracy. Yet there never has been an injunction issued to prevent its accumulation; no writ or other judicial process threatens or is likely to threaten the security of his hold on it. What manager of any company now hesitates to use the property of his stockholders as though it were his own? Where is the railroad president who hesitates to use private cars and private trains, to travel for pleasure across the continent at a cost of tens of thousands of dollars to his company, through fear that any judge or grand jury or prosecuting officer, State or Federal, would require him to answer a charge of wasting funds intrusted to him as trustee?

Sir, these are facts, patent, obvious, undeniable, which we must all deplore. It is time we should consider them—time that we should consider how the demoralization of the public conscience worked by them can be cured. Mr. Chairman, I have said that no man can make a fortune by honest effort which the American people will destroy or public opinion will allow to be endangered. To erect around property, around fortunes, however large, the barrier and rampart of healthy public opinion is indeed an important and a pressing duty. The first step is to make industry—honest industry—the sole fountain of wealth. So, sir, when this huge enginery of fraud is before us, active, sinister, deadly, we must take action which will make its further operation impossible. We at least must say that whatever power we may find it necessary to invoke we shall find some means of making the further operation of these sinister organizations impossible. It may be said that if we restrict the operation of these particular insurance companies to the States which have chartered them they will be unable to prosecute their business in view of contracts already made. Sir, if their withdrawal from business be the necessary result of legitimate restraint, let them, in Heaven's name, go out of business. The problem is simplified decisively by the fact that if they liquidate now the policy holders will be gainers, not losers, by it. The only men that I know who would be subjected to any loss if to-day we should pass some measure making it impossible for any insurance company chartered by a State to do business outside of that State would be, first, the presidents, officers, and agents of those companies, whose opportunities of swindling would be contracted, and, second, that eminent philanthropist who, having risked two millions and a half of dollars for the good of the public, I am sure would rejoice in a dispensation that enabled him to make the sacrifice complete. [Laughter.]

Sir, this being a novel subject, one that raises grave doubt as to how we should proceed, it seems to me that better than a reference of it to any standing committee would be the appointment of a special committee to consider the whole matter in all its branches and report back to this body, first, whether the continued existence of life insurance under the present system is consistent with the security of a republican form of government, and if they find that it endangers the public safety, to suggest a remedy by which the abuse may be eradicated if a remedy be within the power of the Federal Government.

Sir, I do not undertake to suggest the precise steps by which an effective remedy should be established. That I leave to the committee, whichever it may be, to which the House will ultimately refer the whole subject. My object now is, by pointing out the evil, to show the pressing necessity that some remedy, immediate and effective, must be provided if republican government is to survive.

Sir, if this body and this Congress take efficient action to correct this abuse, it will be the first step not merely in the purification of insurance, but in the purification of our whole financial and industrial system. Surely it is time that we should take measures to eradicate this popular idea that the temple of finance is necessarily a den of thieves, a place where conspiracies are hatched against the welfare of the community. Unfortunately, its history for the last few years has justified this suspicion, but that is not its natural function. Financial institutions, stock exchanges, corporations, markets, are all devices to improve and promote the capacity of men to serve one another. The largest profits will be made, believe me, in honest industry rather than in plunder. I do not want any ingenious man reduced to idleness, but I want to divert everyone from avenues of plunder, where he is dangerous, to avenues of industry, where he will be valuable. And he himself will not suffer by the change. The fortunes that stand as monuments raised by honest industry are already inspiring and numerous. By establishing the reign of honesty they will be multiplied and their increase encouraged.

All that we need, Mr. Chairman, is to perform our duty as the Constitution imposes it upon us, as our consciences disclose it to us. We should not tear down the temple, but we must use the scourge which our constitutional system has placed in our hands to drive from the temple the thieves who have violated it. [Applause.] Then will it be a source of prosperity to the people, of honor to the country, and of measureless credit to this legislative body, which, having met these monsters of fraud and corruption that had defiled our whole system—political, financial, and industrial—has shown the courage to face them, the skill to overthrow them, the strength and virtue to slay them. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the message of the President of the United States, but it seems to have resolved itself further into a committee of inquiry into whatever wrongs may be existing in the Union. Joining in that spirit of the House, I would ask their attention to one portion of the President's message in which he refers to the Navy Department. After recommending the annual increase of one battle ship he uses the words:

> If the officers and men are not thoroughly skilled in and have not been thoroughly trained to their duties, it would be far better to keep the ships in port during hostilities than to send them against a formidable opponent, for the result could only be that they would be either sunk or captured.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, the first duty of a solider, or anyone destined for the military service of his country, is to learn to respect the law, and, second, to obey the mandates of his superior officer. So greatly has this been disregarded at the Naval Academy of our country, where these officers are educated and graduated for their future service, that the attention of the House being called to it they found it necessary in the appropriation bill appropriating money for the fiscal year ending 1902, after the appropriation for the Naval Academy, to insert the following:

> Provided further, That the Superintendent of the Military Academy shall make such rules, to be approved by the Secretary of War, as will effectually prevent the practice of hazing, and any cadet found guilty of participating in or urging the maintenance of such practice will be summarily expelled from the academy, and shall not thereafter be appointed to the corps of cadets or be eligible for appointment as a commissioned officer of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps until two years after graduation of the class of which he was a member.

Mr. Chairman, as one of the visitors of the Naval Academy I know that after the passage of this act the then Superintendent said if Congress would stand by him he could put down this nefarious practice. In pursuance of that at the first offense cadets were expelled from the academy and they were not allowed to graduate. Hazing disappeared temporarily, but when a bill was introduced into this Congress that these cadets be restored to the academy, and was passed, we felt that it was dangerous ground to tread upon. We knew that the bill originated in the kind-heartedness of the man who introduced it and of those who supported it; but many of us who felt the same personal pity and regard for the cadets who were expelled felt that it would be injurious to the academy; that Congress, instead of standing behind the Superintendent and representing public opinion, which had forced this law upon the statute book, was giving notice that the cadets would be restored and that they might continue this practice.

Now, Mr. Chairman, take up the daily press of to-day and you will see what takes place. Notwithstanding the terrible catastrophe that resulted in the death under this false system of honor which exists at the Naval Academy, which was enough to have appalled older people, they will find that this nefarious practice still continues. If, in my judgment, it had one particle of effectiveness in making brave men for the Navy, I would be the last to raise any objection against it. But, sir, in my judgment, it is the most cowardly, abject practice that can be entered into in any institution. The man is approached by hazers, and if he dares to show any resistance, if he is imbued in any way with the proprieties that he should obey the law of his country, or that he should carry out the orders of his commanding officer, he is hazed, and if he rebels and shows resistance, under this code that exists, he is obliged to go out within a few days and fight an upper-class man. Is that arrangement fair? Not at all. He must fight a chosen man of the class two years above him, one of the most skilled in athletics, and even if he prevails he must go out again and fight another man and be licked. If he does not then take a second thrashing, he is ostracized at the academy; he will be a marked man through all his course, and throughout the Navy, and his standing as a brave man is gone.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I appeal to Representatives here that it is time for this House to take some action. The law of the land, as well of the people, as expressed, as passed by Representatives of this body, is being defied daily. In yesterday's paper the report came to us from Annapolis that three cadets had been reported, and two were to be expelled. And in the very next paper comes the news that more hazing has taken place.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman what remedy he suggests. Congress has passed very severe laws forbidding hazing, providing penalties, and when the cadets at the academies have violated that law, flagrantly and notoriously violated it, they have been expelled and then have come to Congress and appealed for special exemption from the penalties of their own acts, and Congress has invariably forgiven them and put them back. Now, what remedy can the gentleman suggest?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman from Texas had waited a few minutes, I was coming to that very question, and that is the object of my taking up the valuable time of the House this afternoon.

The gentleman will remember that I was one of those who fought bitterly the passage of the act at the last Congress. It was defeated by those who saw the necessity of possibly appearing hard hearted against these boys at that time. It was defeated twice on the floor of this House. A third time it was brought up, when the good heart of the President had been appealed to—and those personal appeals, we know, are hard to resist—and he sent in a special message to this House, and it was passed. But I will say my object in taking up the time of the House at present is that it is time for us, as the representatives of the people, to send word in no unmistakable terms to these young men at Annapolis, who are being educated at public expense by the taxpayers of the country, that if they continue to defy the sentiment of this country this Congress will not repeat the mistake which, in my judgment, it made at the last session; and the gentleman from Texas and those within sound of my voice, I think, will agree with those who opposed the passage of this bill before, that it must be done in no uncertain terms. We represent the voices here of the American people, and I had proposed yesterday to introduce a resolution appointing a committee of this House to go to the academy and examine into the cases and to report remedies. But upon conference with the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs I found that a member of that committee had already introduced a resolution looking in the same direction, and I considered that he was much more the proper person to do that, and that it should be done under the auspices of the committee which we have designated to carry out our legislation and methods relating to the Navy. Now, I wish to call attention, while I am on this subject, to that resolution. It was introduced yesterday and sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I am told it will be followed up. I would also like to call attention to the bill that has been introduced by my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], looking to punishment of this very crime.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to correct the statement of the gentleman to this effect, that the resolution referred to has not gone to the Committee on Naval Affairs, but instead it has gone to the Committee on Rules, and that makes a difference.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I had understood, and in fact I thought I was informed this morning by a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, that it had gone to that committee. I am very glad to be corrected. I hope the Committee on Rules, then, will not report out any such bill as the Naval Committee did report out last year restoring those cadets to the Academy.

Mr. MUDD. Did not the gentleman from Pennsylvania vote for that?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I did not. I aided on two different occasions on the floor of this House in defeating the bill, and although I could not have helped it, I presume, I regret to say that the bill was brought up on a day that I was absent. It was backed by the President's message or it never could have passed this House. I wish further to say, Mr. Chairman, that these young men, in defying public opinion, are doing what no other set of citizens dare to do. The voice of the American people is potent. The gentleman asks a remedy. Let every cadet, whether he participates in the hazing or is on duty and should report the same, be expelled. The Naval Academy is not in the position of our other institutions of learning, who are seeking to increase their number of students for pecuniary reasons and for fame. But there stand 1,000 good American boys ready to take the place of any cadet who will not obey the law of his country, or not bow to public opinion, or not submit to the rules of his superior officers. In my judgment the whole discipline of the Navy hinges on the school where the officers are taught. If an officer does not learn to obey, we can not expect that one below him will.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. I am with the gentleman, and want to stop hazing; but, is it not a fact that there is a law now against hazing at West Point and Annapolis?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman had paid that attention to my remarks which I wish he had, he would have heard me read it.

Mr. SULZER. I did; but if the law is violated who is responsible for the violation?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Congress is responsible for restoring those cadets after the provisions of the law were carried out by the superintendent of the academy. [Applause.] If the gentleman will bear with me, I wish to state that my whole object in taking up the time of the House at this time is to call the attention of the older Members, who may have forgotten it, and of the newer Members, who may not be aware of it, to that fact.

Mr. SULZER. I agree substantially with the gentleman, but is it not true that the Secretary of the Navy the other day approved the findings of the court-martial which tried a young man for hazing, or fighting, in which another cadet, his opponent, was killed?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. In reply to the gentleman, it is a matter of opinion only, but in my judgment the Secretary of the Navy was entirely too lenient on that occasion—mark you, not that he was so unfortunate as to kill a classmate, because the testimony showed that young Branch was probably killed by striking his head while falling. My ardent sympathy goes out to Meriwether, for all through his life he will carry what he can not undo and what will be a source of regret to him; but the Secretary of the Navy should have expelled that cadet, in my judgment, for breaking the law of the land and not obeying the orders of his superior officer, for that is the strength and the foundation of all military service.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennslyvania if he does not think the ruling of the distinguished Secretary of the Navy rather tends to impress the people with the idea that he wanted to minimize the offense committed when he draws a distinction in the manner of the commission of manslaughter between death caused by a blow of the fist and death caused because a man is knocked down and crushes his skull on the ground or on some structure? In other words, is not that a result that logically leads up to this; if A crushes the skull of B with his fist he has committed manslaughter, and if he crushes his skull with a club it is the club that crushes it and not the man? Now, is not that sort of ruling indicative of the purpose of practically nullifying the laws of the country?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I think the ruling of the Secretary, as I have already said, was too mild. In the incident of the death I sympathize and think it was unfortunate; but that death is part and parcel of this code that exists at the academy, which is responsible for the hazing and for the breach of discipline and for the breaking of laws. It is the code, and it is the carrying of it out and the insistence of the cadets in clinging to and carrying out this code that we must stamp out; and I say, if they will not desist, turn them out of the academy by the dozens or by the hundreds, for there are lots of American boys, as each one of us knows by the applications we have—and we regret we can not appoint them all—who are good enough and loyal enough Americans to go to that academy and fit themselves for the great naval arm of the military service. There is no difficulty in filling the places of those; and, mark my words, expulsion will stop this practice, for a boy who gets his appointment to Annapolis has too valuable a thing for life to throw it away by clinging to any ridiculous code that has come down to him from the past.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I think I have shown my object in addressing the committee. This thing must be stamped out, and in my judgment Congress alone can do it.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. With pleasure. I am glad to see so much interest in the subject.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Chairman, whether he does not think that the dignity of this House and good government at the Military Academy or at the Naval Academy would be subserved by leaving the government of schoolboys to schoolmasters, where, in my opinion, it properly belongs?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I think the dignity of this House would be conserved if the schoolmasters carried out their duty and put the thing down, but the schoolmasters do not. Their sentences are light, and we, as representatives of the people who pay the taxes for the support and education of these boys, have the right to know that our money is being expended properly and carried out for the good of the service. To refer to the words of the President, "battle ships and the whole Navy are no good without competent and efficient officers," and, as the gentleman from New York stated in regard to insurance, we must go to the root of the evil. We must go down to the training school which fits and educates officers for the Navy and implant some ideas of discipline and obedience. When you do that you are going to the root of the evil, for the future competency, efficiency, and bravery of the Navy—in my judgment better than all the rules and regulations you can make and leaving it to the schoolmasters, as the gentleman from West Virginia suggests, who, up to this time, have not succeeded in stamping it out. Captain Bronson, Superintendent there, said that if Congress would stand by him he would stamp it out, but Congress has not stood by the Superintendent of the Academy. We put back boys by a special act who had been expelled, and in my judgment that is a great evil, and that is why I have asked the attention of the House—to put this matter before them.

Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes' time to my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL], and I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania yields ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL].

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, referring to the resolution that at present is before the House, I would like to say that I am entirely in sympathy with the remarks made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], and for this reason: There does not seem to be any logic, to my mind, in the assignment of the bills that have already been introduced in regard to the subject of life insurance. I had the honor, I think, to introduce the first bill on this side of Congress on the subject of Federal control of life-insurance companies. That bill I introduced on the 11th of December, 1903. It provided a remedy through the Post-Office Department, and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. On the day following of the next year—the 12th of December, 1904—I introduced another bill, which simply provided that a commissioner of insurance should be attached to the Bureau of Commerce and Labor. That bill was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. On the first day of this session I introduced three bills on the subject of life insurance. One of these bills was practically the same bill that was referred last year to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Yet all of these three bills were this year, without exception, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am thoroughly of the opinion that either these bills should be referred to the committee according to the subject-matter of the bills and the remedy suggested or else they should be referred to an entirely impersonal committee, such as the Committee on the Judiciary.

As far as the constitutionality of Federal control of life-insurance companies is concerned, I am satisfied in my own mind that such control can be exercised under the Constitution. In connection with the bill I introduced last year I consulted eminent lawyers in regard to the point of constitutionality, and one of them, the Hon. James M. Beck, who was lately the Assistant Attorney-General of the United States, was so satisfied in his mind in regard to the constitutionality of its provision that he volunteered to come to Washington and to appear before the committee and argue that phase of the question.

Mr. FINLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY]?

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I will yield.

Mr. FINLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman to what extent there can be better control, and to what extent the control the States now have may be assumed or taken over by the Federal Government?

Mr. MORRELL. The gentleman from South Carolina asks two questions—first, to what extent there can be better control, and, second, how far the National Government may assume or take over the control now exercised by the States. Both questions are, I think, answered in the bill introduced by me on the first day of the session for extending the visitorial power of the United States over certain corporations organized under State laws and for taxing such corporations. My view is that the control exercised by the Bureau of Currency over the national banks is better than that exercised by the State of New York over the insurance and trust companies of that State—infinitely better. The stockholders and depositors and creditors of national banks and the general public are better protected under the national banking system than under the lax and crime-breeding insurance system which now prevails in this country. This is manifest to everybody. The reason for it may be, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has just said, because the States have neglected their duties or failed to exercise their powers in the matter. But it seems to me that, in some cases, at least, the States have abused their powers; that they have used their powers in connivance with dishonest men to plunder and hoodwink the people of other States. There is no doubt, for instance, that the State of New York has not only neglected its duties in respect to the business of life insurance, but has gone on from negative wrongdoing to affirmative wrongdoing, and has done so to such an extent as to demand the intervention of Congress for the protection of citizens of the United States living in other States. For, as I shall show in the course of my remarks, that State has in its statutes passed in 1890 and 1892 deliberately laid the foundation for the very abuses that have arisen there.

The bill which I have introduced is designed to correct those legal outrages. It is a very brief bill, a mere skeleton; but I think it covers the whole ground, including the question of taxation, which has plunged us into this debate. It is an attempt to adopt the principles and methods of the national banking system to the business of life insurance, and is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sovereign visitorial power of the United States shall be, and is hereby, so extended as to include the inspection, supervision, and control of every life-insurance corporation organized under the laws of any State whose assets or any part thereof are, or may hereafter be, invested in the capital stock of any trust company or banking association, and of every trust company and banking association so organized whose capital stock, or any part thereof, is owned by any life-insurance company; and the Comptroller of the Currency is hereby authorized and required to ascertain by investigation of the affairs of insurance companies, trust companies, and banking associations the facts necessary to form the basis of the supervision and control herein provided for: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to deprive any State of its visitorial power over any such corporation, except where the State authority conflicts in its action with the provisions of this act: And provided further, That it shall not affect strictly benevolent associations or institutions insuring only their own members.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of Title LXII of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to national banking associations, shall be applied in the visitation of life insurance and trust companies and State banking associations under this act, so far as the said provisions may be appropriate. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to enforce them.

SEC. 3. That every such insurance company shall pay to the United State, in the month of January, a duty of one-fourth of 1 per cent each year upon the average amount of its gross assets for that year beyond the amount invested in United States bonds; and every such trust company and banking association shall, in like manner, and at like times, pay to the said Treasurer a duty of one-half of 1 per cent upon the average amount of its capital stock and of its deposits during the year, and also upon the average amount of its investments beyond the amount invested in bonds of the United States. And in order to enable the Treasurer to assess the duties imposed by this section each corporation liable to the payment of such duties shall, within ten days from the 1st of January each year, make a return under the oath of its president and treasurer to the Treasurer of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, of the average amount of its gross assets beyond the amount invested in United States bonds, and the average amount of its investments, deposits, and capital stock for the year next preceding the 1st day of January; any such corporation failing to make such returns shall be liable to a penalty of $1,000, to be collected in the manner in which penalties are to be collected of other corporations under the laws of the United States.

The day following the introduction of my bill the President, in his annual message, discussed the subject at considerable length. I quote extracts from his message relating to the supervision of corporations of every kind which do an interstate business, and also from that portion of the message in which he deals specifically with insurance companies. On the subject of visitation in general, the President says:

Where there is no governmental restraint or supervision some of the exceptional men use their energies not in ways that are for the common good, but in ways which tell against this common good. The fortunes amassed through corporate organization are now so large, and vest such power in those that wield them, as to make it a matter of necessity to give to the sovereign—that is, to the Government, which represents the people as a whole—some effective power of supervision over their corporate use. In order to insure a healthy social and industrial life every big corporation should be held responsible by and be accountable to some sovereign strong enough to control its conduct.

* * * Experience has shown conclusively that it is useless to try to get any adequate regulation and supervision of these great corporations by State action. Such regulation and supervision can only be effectively exercised by a sovereign whose jurisdiction is coextensive with the field of work of the corporations—that is, by the National Government. I believe that this regulation and supervision can be obtained by the enactment of law by the Congress. * * * There at present exists a very unfortunate condition of things, under which these great corporations doing an interstate business occupy the position of subjects without a sovereign, neither any State government nor the National Government having effective control over them. Our steady aim should be by legislation, cautiously and carefully undertaken, but resolutely persevered in, to assert the sovereignty of the National Government by affirmative action. * * * The great insurance companies afford striking examples of corporations whose business has extended so far beyond the jurisdiction of the States which created them as to preclude strict enforcement of supervision and regulation by the parent States. * * * The inability of a State to regulate effectively insurance corporations created under the laws of other States and transacting the larger part of their business elsewhere is also clear. As a remedy for this evil of conflicting, ineffective, and yet burdensome regulations there has been for many years a widespread demand for Federal supervision. The Congress has already recognized that interstate insurance may be a proper subject for Federal legislation, for in creating the Bureau of Corporations it authorized it to publish and supply useful information concerning interstate corporations, "including corporations engaged in insurance." It is obvious that if the compilation of statistics be the limit of the Federal power it is wholly ineffective to regulate this form of commercial intercourse between the States, and as the insurance business has outgrown in magnitude the possibility of adequate State supervision the Congress should carefully consider whether further legislation can be had.

The President, quoting from a previous message on the subject, added another strong reason for Federal supervision and control of insurance companies—a reason which, in my opinion, would be conclusive, even if it were the only reason. He said:

The United States should in this respect follow the policy of other nations by providing adequate national supervision of commercial interests which are clearly national in character. My predecessors have repeatedly recognized that the foreign business of these companies is an important part of our foreign commercial relations. During the Administrations of Presidents Cleveland, Harrison, and McKinley the State Department exercised its influence, through diplomatic channels, to prevent unjust discrimination by foreign countries against American insurance companies. These negotiations illustrated the propriety of the Congress recognizing the national character of insurance, for in the absence of Federal legislation the State Department could only give expression to the wishes of the authorities of the several States, whose policy was ineffective through want of uniformity.

These are the practical arguments in favor of the exercise of visitorial power by the Government of the United States. As such they are sufficient. But there seems to be in Congress no right to deprive any State of its visitorial power over any corporation created by itself for public purposes so long as the activities of such a corporation are strictly confined to the limits of the parent State. Judge Story's opinion in the Dartmouth College case (4 Wheaton, p. 673) has been regarded as conclusive on that point. And Judge Cooley says:

In the United States the legislature is the visitor of all corporations created by it where there is no individual founder or donor, and may direct judicial proceedings against such corporations for such abuses or neglects as would at common law cause a forfeiture of their charter. (1 Cooley's Blackstone, 482, note.)

But the maxim cessat ratio, cessat lex applies in this case as well as in others, so that whenever the activities of a corporation created by any State reach beyond the territorial limits of that State and mingle with the business activities of the nation or of foreign countries it becomes the right and duty of the Federal Government to control such corporation; and the State which permits its creatures to work beyond its own boundaries must be regarded as having surrendered its exclusive visitorial right over such creatures and as having voluntarily cast the burden of managing them upon the national authorities.

By means of my bill the United States would adopt these truants of the States and place them under proper surveillance. It would make them Federal corporations for certain purposes, but would not deny to any State the right of controlling its own offspring within its own boundaries unless that offspring engages, directly or indirectly, in the business of banking. It would take control of corporations organized under State laws for conducting the business of life insurance whenever they form combinations with trust companies and banks whose business is not confined within the limits of the parent State but enters into the general current of our national business. This right of visitation is a public right existing in the Government for the very purpose of examining into the affairs of a corporation with a view to keeping it within its legal powers. It is inherent in every government, just as the police power is.

The relations existing between the three great life-insurance companies of New York and the banks and trust companies of that city have been very clearly shown by the testimony taken by the Armstrong committee. The report of its proceedings of the 27th of November, 1905, contains some testimony by Mr. George W. Perkins, who was connected with J. P. Morgan & Co., with the United States Steel Corporation, with the New York Security and Trust Company, and with the New York Life Insurance Company. If there were no other evidence to show the community of interest between banks, trust companies, insurance companies, and speculative enterprises, to say nothing of the infamous methods pursued by such combinations, this testimony of Mr. Perkins would alone be sufficient warrant for extending the visitorial power of the Federal Government over every life-insurance company affiliated with a trust company or a bank. Mr. Perkins said:

The Steel Corporation was organized in February of 1901, and at that time a syndicate was organized in connection with the forming of the corporation. It was about that time that I entered the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. In addition to this syndicate formation it was necessary for the corporation to appoint some one the registrar of its $500,000,000 of preferred stock. The office of registrar was very much sought after by the trust companies, and I used my influence to control the placing of that, and also the allotment of $3,000,000 in the syndicate.

I then approached the New York Security and Trust Company and told them I could arrange for them to be made registrar of the $500,000,000 of preferred stock, and to be allotted $3,000,000 in the syndicate, and if so, I wanted them to set aside a substantial interest in the syndicate participation for whomsoever I might designate.

And he designated the New York Life, which, upon his sole authority, took a participation of $2,325,000, and made no record of the transaction. Mr. Perkins also played an important part in the Northern Securities concern. This was a sort of trust company or security-holding company, organized under the laws of New Jersey in November, 1901, with a capital of $400,000,000. There were fifteen directors, of whom eight were connected officially with the three great life insurance companies. These were James J. Hill, trustee of the Equitable Life; George F. Baker, trustee of the Mutual Life; George W. Perkins, trustee and financial manager of the New York Life; E. H. Harriman, a director in the Equitable; James Stillman, director in the Mutual; Jacob H. Schiff, director in the Equitable, and John S. Kennedy, trustee of the New York Life. The three life insurance companies represented in the directorate of this unlawful concern furnished $19,755,000 toward floating the stock of that concern.

The little coterie of capitalists to which Mr. Perkins and about thirty others belong wield a greater power in this country by means of the corporations which they control than the thirty tyrants of Athens ever wielded. They exert a money power greater than ever before existed anywhere in the world. They control railway interests exceeding $11,000,000,000 in value. They control life insurance companies whose assets amount to a billion and a half dollars. They control great industrial enterprises like the United States Steel Corporation, the Standard Oil Company, the Amalgamated Copper Company, the International Mercantile Marine Company, the Public Service Corporation of New Jersey, the New York Consolidated Gas Company, and the street railways of Greater New York. And, in addition, they control such financial institutions as the National City Bank, the National Bank of Commerce, and the Hanover National Bank, besides numerous trust companies which perform all the functions of banks except issuing notes to circulate as money. The banks are so entangled with the other mass of interests under their control that the whole system, including the banks, must stand or fall together; and if the system fails, the entire national banking system will go down with it. A glance at the directorates of some of these institutions will show how they are interlaced. Thus, for instance, the National Bank of Commerce, in which the Mutual Life owns $4,500,000 of stock and the Equitable $3,653,000, we find in its directorate Valentine P. Snyder, George J. Gould, James W. Alexander, H. C. Deming, James H. Hyde, and William H. McIntyre, of the Equitable Life; Frederick Cromwell, Richard A. McCurdy, Alexander Iselin, jr., G. G. Haven, James N. Jarvie, Augustus D. Jouillard, and H. McK. Twombley, of the Mutual Life, and John Claflin and Alexander E. Orr, of the New York Life.

Every one of these men must own, in his own right, at least ten shares of the capital stock of any banking association of which he is a director, in order to comply with section 5146 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. So that here we find a partnership between the directors of these three great life insurance companies, as individuals, and the companies, as corporations, in a national bank. The profits of these directors of the bank depend largely upon the amount of money deposited in their bank by the life insurance companies, of which they are also directors. Is it any wonder that the Mutual Life keeps $7,000,000 on deposit in that bank? Or that the Equitable Life and the New York Life also keep large deposits there? Are not these men doing a banking business upon the money of the insurance companies? If so, are not the insurance companies being used as banking instrumentalities? Should they not be brought under the same supervision and control as the banks to which they have thus been made subsidiary? Whether the banks are at the mercy of the insurance companies, as Mr. Schiff declares, or whether the insurance companies are at the mercy of the banks, as Mr. Cromwell declares, in either case both classes of institutions should be under Federal supervision, for it is certain that the ruin of one class would work the ruin of the other, and thereby cause the derangement of the entire business of the country.

Not only have the insurance companies gone directly into the banking business as partners of their directors, trustees, and executive officers, in cases like that of the National Bank of Commerce, but they have gone into it much more extensively by indirection, through "syndicates" and "joint accounts." In these transactions the directors and officers of the insurance companies enter into contracts by the terms of which they, on behalf of the insurance companies, agree to furnish the ready money necessary to buy large blocks of bonds or other securities, and on behalf of the banks which they also represent, to take all or any part of the profits, not less than half, without incurring any risks. Very often, too, the officers and directors of the insurance companies "participate" in these "syndicates," with much profit and no risk to themselves. The testimony of Mr. Richard A. McCurdy and Mr. Frederick Cromwell, of the Mutual Life; Mr. George W. Perkins and Mr. John A. McCall, of the New York Life; Mr. James H. Hyde and Senator CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, of the Equitable Life; and Senator JOHN F. DRYDEN, of the Prudential, given before the Armstrong committee, explains these operations. They are clearly in violation of law, but are defended upon the ground of necessity. The argument in favor of them was succinctly stated by Frederick Cromwell when he was on the witness stand on September 13, 1905. Mr. Cromwell said:

We are partners in every syndicate which we go into, and the syndicate has as its manager a banker. We do not do a banking business, and I go so far as to say that unless we went into the syndicate we would not be able to invest our funds.

We couldn't make the transactions of $100,000,000 a year in the securities of this company without using the syndicates, I think.

If he had said that this company was in the habit of entering into partnerships with bankers, in order to do a banking business, which it was not authorized by its charter to engage in, he would have expressed the truth more clearly. Mr. Cromwell gave a list of sixteen underwriting syndicates in which the Mutual Life had participated and the names of the bankers who conducted them. In every case the syndicate made a profit, arising in part from the purchase by the life-insurance company of the securities it handled. Mr. Cromwell, Mr. McCurdy, and others participated in these profits. Mr. Cromwell's personal gains amounted to $26,371. The bankers who conducted these syndicates were J. P. Morgan & Co., Speyer & Co., Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and Strong, Sturgis & Co. The securities handled included the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad bonds, which played such an important part in the Northern Securities deal; and also the Third Avenue Consolidated bonds, Southern Pacific bonds, Pennsylvania Railroad bonds, Oregon Short Line bonds, and Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe bonds.

The New York Life and Equitable Life also participated in some, if not all, of these syndicates, all three of the insurance companies becoming in this way partners in a banking business, and furnishing to E. H. Harriman the ready money necessary to enable him to control the Union Pacific Railroad and to Hill and Morgan the cash needed to develop the Northern Securities deal.

On the 24th and 27th of November, 1905, it was established by documentary and oral evidence before the committee that the New York Life was in the United States Steel syndicate with J. P. Morgan & Co., though that syndicate had not been mentioned in the list submitted as "a complete list." I quote from the New York Evening Sun's report of the proceedings of November 24 and 27 an account of this affair, because it illustrates the methods of the New York Life in its operations through its subsidiary trust companies and through its vice-president and financial manager, Mr. George W. Perkins, with J. P. Morgan & Co., of which firm Mr. Perkins is a partner, and because it also shows the relation between the New York Life and Andrew Hamilton, the notorious lobbyist of the associated insurance companies. The report of the proceedings of the 24th is as follows:

Milton Mattison, a bookkeeper in the New York Life, took the stand. He presented a list of participations of his company in various syndicate transactions. Mr. Hughes asked him why the transaction in steel through the New York Security and Trust Company was left out.

"That was not among our securities," replied the witness.

Mr. Hughes then read an entry from the New York Life blotter, dated April, 1903: "U. S. Steel syndicate, 3.006 per cent on $2,325,000, less ¼ New York Security & Trust Co., $52,417.13. The above amount received under their contract. Mr. R. ordered this stamped."

A letter was also offered in evidence from Alexander S. Webb, jr., secretary of the New York Security and Trust Company, to E. P. Randolph, treasurer of the New York Life, which read in part: "We beg to send you check for $52,417.13, being dividend upon the interest in the U. S. Steel syndicate which we are carrying for you."

Pinned to this was a memorandum, which the witness told Mr. Hughes was in Mr. Shipman's handwriting:

"The above amount was received from the New York Security and Trust Company. Mr. Webb will send another letter."

"What amount of money had the New York Life paid on account of that participation?" asked Mr. Hughes.

"It didn't pay anything; it put the amount in the trust company as a deposit. I presume $2,325,000. That was No. 4 account. That is the natural inference."

"We don't want natural inferences," observed Mr. Hughes. "I had a natural inference that all participations were included in this list."

The report of November 27 contains the testimony of Mr. George W. Perkins in relation to this transaction, a portion of which I have already quoted. Mr. Perkins had been taken into the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. just before the United States Steel Corporation was formed, perhaps with a view to enlisting the New York Life in the venture. He became a member of the steel corporation. He went into the syndicate to float its stock. He then made a verbal arrangement with Mr. Charles S. Fairchild, president of the New York Securities and Trust Company, by which that concern was to take $3,000,000 of steel stock and shift $2,325,000 of it to the New York Life, the latter company depositing that amount with the trust company. No record of this transaction appeared on the books of the New York Life, except in the blotter of the company's treasury department, in which there was the following memorandum:

Commissions and profits earned by syndicate participations in 1902 (on account of United States Steel Corporation syndicate dividend), $27,876.71.

The above amount was received from the New York Security and Trust Company, account of compensation for funds contributed (under their guaranty) to their participation in United States Steel syndicate. Five per cent was declared, amounting to $67,107.50, with trust company's commission out, but only $27,876.71 was remitted to us

See trust company's letter October 1.

Andrew Hamilton received balance, $59,310.79, under Mr. G. W. Perkins's arrangement.

In explanation of the secret arrangement for the payment to Hamilton, Mr. Perkins said:

In the fall of 1901 President McCall stated to me that in connection with moneys expended on behalf of the New York Life he had had the Central National Bank and the New York Security and Trust Company advance Hamilton and E. E. McCall, at different times from 1896 to 1901, various sums of money, secured by notes of those gentlemen, and that he would like to have the balance remaining unpaid in both these institutions put into one account and paid out of subsequent profits that would result from the arrangement between the New York Life and the trust companies in the steel syndicate transaction.

I therefore arranged with J. P. Morgan & Co. to pay the Central National Bank, as they did on December 31, 1901, the sum of $40,751.39, and to the New York Security and Trust Company, on the same date, the sum of $15,969.16, making a total of $56,720.55. This sum was carried by Messrs. Morgan & Co., without any obligation from Mr. Hamilton or anyone else, until it was deducted, with interest at 6 per cent, in October, 1902, from the profits then distributed to the trust company, and a statement was furnished by Morgan & Co. to the trust company, and in turn by the trust company to the New York Life.

It appears further on in Mr. Perkins's testimony that all the members of the finance committee of the New York Life, which at that time consisted of Mr. Perkins himself, Mr. Cleveland, Mr. Randolph, Mr. McCall, Mr. Langdon, Mr. Morrison, and Mr. Grace, knew fully the particulars of this steel syndicate transaction, and knew also that there was no record made of it in the minutes. Mr. John A. McCall had previously sworn to the correctness of reports to the insurance departments of the States, in which reports there was no mention of the New York Life's participation in the steel syndicate. He had also sworn to the correctness of a statement of the "legal expenses" of the New York Life, from which the payments made to Hamilton and E. E. McCall out of the profits of that syndicate were omitted.

It was also shown by the testimony of Mr. Perkins and Mr. Mattison on the 24th and 27th of November that the New York Life had advanced $930,000 to enable Mr. Perkins to conduct a syndicate or joint account transaction in Mexican Central bonds in 1904. The Mexican Central Railway was to be provided with $2,000,000 immediately. Mr. Perkins agreed with a representative of Kidder, Peabody & Co., of Boston, to furnish one-half of this sum, and arranged with the New York Life to make the loan. On June 27, 1904, $1,000,000 worth of bonds were delivered to the New York Life, for which it sent its check to the Boston bankers for $930,000. The New York Life received as its compensation the interest on the $1,000,000 worth of bonds, which amounted to a little less than $6,000. One-half the profits on the resale of the bonds amounted to $40,000. This sum was paid to the New York Life by Kidder, Peabody & Co., on September 17, and was turned over to Mr. George W. Perkins, who says that he invested it in United States Steel common stock for the use of the Nylic fund, of which he was trustee, but that it was not included in the $945,146 which the New York Life had contributed in that fund according to his previous statement on that subject. Mr. Perkins said that no record was entered in the books of the New York Life to show the receipt of the $40,000 profits made on the Mexican Central deal. No mention of it was made in the sworn reports made by the company to the insurance departments of the States.

On September 23, 1905, when Mr. Perkins was under examination, it was shown that there was what might be termed a fictitious sale by himself as financial manager of the New York Life to J. P. Morgan & Co., acting through himself as a member of that firm, of $800,000 of the stock of the International Mercantile Marine Company for $800,000 in cash; and that this sale, which took place the day before the New York Life made its report to the State insurance department, was reported as if it were a valid transaction; whereas, in fact, Mr. Perkins only had borrowed $800,000 from Morgan & Co. for two days, and the New York Life had recognized the transaction as a loan, and paid $266.67 interest for the use of the money for two days, and had not parted with the stock in question at all. It was also shown that two days after Mr. Perkins had made this pretended sale from himself to himself he resold to himself from himself the same stock for the same price, returned the money with interest to Morgan & Co., and the stock to the New York Life. In this way it was made to appear that the stock was selling at par when such was not the case, and the insurance department of the State was deceived as to the real condition of the New York Life.

Mr. Jacob H. Schiff, the manager of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., went into the directorate of the Equitable Life and became a member of its finance committee. Mr. E. E. Harriman, connected with Kuhn, Loeb & Co.'s banking and railroad enterprises, also became a director. The sequel shows that the Equitable's funds were used to advance the projects of banking and railroad business of Mr. Schiff's firm by participating in the $50,000,000 Union Pacific blind pool. On November 14, 1905, when Mr. James H. Hyde, of the Equitable, was on the witness stand before the Armstrong committee, he was asked by Mr. Hughes:

"Did you go into that transaction to facilitate Mr. Harriman's getting control of the Union Pacific?"

"That was not discussed," answered Mr. Hyde. "But it was understood, obviously," was the reply.

Mr. Hyde also testified that Harriman requested him to keep secret even from the directors the fact that Equitable money was being used in the pool in Hyde's name. He said that he even refused to disclose the fact to the superintendent of insurance.

He also said that Mr. Schiff was present at a meeting when one of the participations was made. When Mr. Schiff's testimony was recalled, Mr. Hyde said:

"Well, Mr. Schiff is a little hard of hearing."

The New York Security and Trust Company is only a fair example of those subsidiary companies whose stockholders and officers are made up of the trustees and directors and executive officers of the great life insurance companies and of bankers and brokers connected with them, and which form such a remarkable feature of the Wall street system. Almost every man whose name appears on the list of great financiers is interested in these trust companies. Some of these men are directors in nearly all of them, as well as in other corporations. Mr. Frederick Cromwell, for instance, is a director in sixteen corporations; Mr. Peabody, the new president of the Mutual, is in nineteen, and Hon. CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW in more than seventy. Acting as the directors of the insurance companies, they buy for those companies large blocks of stock in a bank or trust company, and then, acting in their individual capacities, they buy for themselves other shares. Then they elect themselves directors and officers of these newly acquired institutions. Then, acting for the life insurance companies, they deposit immense sums of money belonging to the policy holders of their respective life insurance companies with these trust companies, and that increases the value of the stock enormously, because it enables them to do an exceedingly profitable business.

When Mr. Frederick Cromwell, treasurer of the Mutual, was on the witness stand September 14, he admitted that the Mutual practically owned the Morton Trust Company, the Guaranty Trust Company, and the United States Mortgage and Trust Company; that it owned 2,000 shares of the Morton Trust Company's stock, and that he personally owned 50 shares of it. He said that the profit on this stock had been $22,000,000. He admitted that in the National Bank of Commerce, one of the Mutual's subsidiary institutions, the Mutual maintained a deposit of about $7,000,000, which drew only 2 per cent interest, despite the fact that call money on the street brought 3 and 4 per cent. The Morton Trust Company has had a deposit of $500,000 belonging to the Mutual ever since it opened its doors; in the Bank of Morristown there is $250,000; in the Bank of California there is an investment of $500,000 in that institution's increased capital stock.

When Mr. Richard A. McCurdy, president of the Mutual Life, was on the witness stand October 19, 1905, he was asked about the Mutual Life's interest in the Fifth Avenue Trust Company. He said that the insurance company owned from 2,500 to 3,200 shares of stock, and that it kept on deposit with the trust company from $500,000 to $1,000,000. He was also asked if he had prepared a statement showing in what other financial institutions he himself held an interest, and he read from a paper a statement to the effect that he owned 50 shares of stock in the American Exchange Bank, 50 shares in the Bond and Mortgage and Guarantee Company, 1,132 shares in the National Bank of Commerce, New York; 50 share in the Commercial Trust Company of New Jersey; 200 shares in the Fifth Avenue Trust Company; 100 shares in the Mercantile Trust Company; 512 shares in the Morristown Trust Company; 200 shares in the United States Mortgage and Trust Company, and 50 shares in the Girard Trust Company, of Philadelphia. The Mutual Life held stock not only in the Fifth Avenue Trust Company, but in all the other institutions mentioned.

Should the Morton Trust Company have an opportunity to lend a million or two to the New York Central or some other railroad, but had not sufficient money on hand for the purpose, the Mutual simply increased its deposit to the required amount. Perhaps it got a shade more interest for the increased deposit, or perhaps only the regulation "2 per cent on daily balances." The trust company, however, got its 5 and 6 and 7 per cent from the railroad company.

This is just what the Equitable has been doing with those banks and trust companies for years—the Mercantile Trust and the Equitable Trust. And it is what the New York Life has been doing with the New York Security and Trust Company and its other "channels," what the Prudential has been doing with its "Fidelity Trust Company," and what the Metropolitan Life has been doing with its "Hamilton Trust Company."

The trust company is necessary to the syndicate, the insurance company is necessary to the trust company, and the money of the policy holders is necessary to both when the directorate of each has the same set of bankers.

The "yellow-dog fund" of the Equitable was concealed in the Mercantile Trust, under the name of the J. W. Alexander Account No. 3. We have just seen how the steel syndicate, out of the profits of which Hamilton was paid $59,000, was concealed in the New York Security and Trust Company. The wild-cat speculation of the Mutual Life in the New York Dock Company affair was conducted through the United States Mortgage and Trust Company. The general public and the public authorities are deceived in this way as to the real transactions of the insurance companies, and the abuse calls loudly for some remedy. Such things could not take place with impunity if the machinery of the Treasury Department of the United States were brought to bear upon insurance companies as well as national banks.

When life-insurance companies are so dominated or influenced by bankers that they find it impossible to do a legitimate business as life-insurance companies, why should they be exempt from the control of the same authority which controls the banks? The illegitimate practices of the men who conduct great financial operations must be stopped. The men must be reached. To say that they can not be reached by the Federal Government because the associations into which they have entered are organized under State laws, even though their doings threaten the stability of our national banking system and the existence of the Union, is an absurdity. If Congress has not the power to punish them for their violations of State laws, it has at least the power to have their business investigated and their business faults corrected, so far as that business and those faults endanger or embarrass the financial system of the nation. If we can not govern them without taxing them, then it is our right and our duty to tax them.

As it is nobody can feel safe, because nobody knows what these giants are doing. The reports which they have made to the State authorities have been shown to be false, and the reports of the insurance superintendents are clearly worthless or worse. The Equitable Life made its own attorney, a gentleman named Pierce, State superintendent of insurance. The three great companies have combined in order to support a corrupt lobby at Albany. They have been giving hundreds of thousands of dollars to such men as Andrew Hamilton, A. O. Fields, W. S. Thummel, and other lobbyists. The Equitable, according to the testimony, has paid $10,000 a year for a long time to Senator PLATT for use in elections. The Mutual has on several occasions paid $10,000 to Senator PLATT for the same purposes.

In the campaigns of 1896, 1900, and 1904, the Mutual, the Equitable, and New York Life, the Metropolitan, and the Prudential contributed large sums to the same national committee. The testimony of Messrs. Thummel, Perkins, McCall, Olyphant, Hegeman, Hon. THOMAS C. PLATT, Hon. JOHN F. DRYDEN, and Hon. CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW discloses these facts.

These payments were not recorded in the books of the insurance companies. Neither were they reported to the authorities of any State in the sworn reports of those companies. Mr. Richard A. McCurdy swore that if any contribution had been made by the Mutual to any New York State campaign committee he knew nothing of it. Senator PLATT in his own testimony contradicted this statement. Concerning such contributions, Senator PLATT said that he had received as contributions to the Republican State committee's campaign fund the sum of $10,000 a year for a period of ten or fifteen years from the Equitable Life Assurance Society. During the same period he received $10,000 a year for a number of years, but not every year, from the Mutual Life Insurance Company. The Senator explained that the contributions of the Equitable and the Mutual had always been sent to him in cash by a messenger. When asked if he had ever solicited these contributions he said that he had not, but had talked with President McCurdy, of the Mutual, about funds.

On this point the questions by Mr. Hughes and the answers by Senator PLATT were as follows:

Q. How did it happen that the Mutual Life contributed the money? Was it in pursuance of an understanding between yourself and Mr. McCurdy?—A. I simply asked him at various times when necessities were very great for money, and he said he would be very glad to subscribe.
Q. This was for the State campaign?—A. Yes, sir
Q. And Mr. McCurdy so understood it?—A. He understood it, and could not understand it any other way, because I was not representing the national campaign.

Senator PLATT said that he had received a few contributions of $10,000 a year from Mr. John A. McCall, president of the New York Life Insurance Company, but had no personal knowledge as to whether or not the money came out of the funds of the company or was a personal contribution from Mr. McCall.

I submit the questions and answers as to the motives which prompted these contributions:

Q. Senator, what do you understand was the quid pro quo of those contributions? Did you ever understand that the companies might expect something in return?—A. I supposed that they would expect my influence in opposition to adverse legislation.
Q. Did they ever ask you to influence legislation?—A. Never.
Q. Could you have done so?—A. No.
Q. Then what service could you render?—A. I suppose that they thought I might have had some little influence with my party.

When Mr. Charles M. Turner, president of the Security Mutual Life Insurance Company, of Binghamton, N. Y., was on the witness stand before the Armstrong committee on December 7, 1905, he testified that a certain man named Keever was employed as the actuary of that company while also a clerk in the actuary's department of the State insurance department. Keever got a salary of $1,000 a year from the Security Mutual, but the witness didn't know how much the State paid him. He thought Keever might still be holding his job in the company. He managed not to let one job interfere with the other, of course.

The "legal expenses" of the Mutual were $347,000 in 1903, $130,000 in excess of 1902, when they were $216,000. For 1904 they were $459,000; in 1901, $243,000. In these four years the "legal expenses" of the Mutual amounted to $1,265,000. Mr. Robert Olyphant, who is a member of its committee of expenditures, says that money for secret and confidential purposes is charged to the account of "legal expenses."

Mr. Olyphant said on the witness stand October 10, 1905, that the Mutual Life had paid out $200,000 on vouchers of $25,000 each, in 1903 and 1904, on account of "private legal expenses."

This money had been turned over to E. L. Short, the general solicitor of the company, from whom no itemized account was required. Short used the money in "dealing" with State legislatures for the joint benefit of the three great life insurance companies.

Mr. Robert A. Grannis, vice-president of the Mutual Life, testifying on the same day, said:

If money was necessary to protect the company against adverse legislation, there was no hesitation in laying out the requisite funds.

Mr. Walter R. Gillette, vice-president of the Mutual Life, said that the general solicitor of the company could get whatever funds he wanted without giving any reason for it.

Mr. John A. McCall, president of the New York Life, in his testimony before the committee October 4, 1905, presented the following statement of the expenses of the "law department" of his company for the past six years, showing that nearly half of the gross amount of legal expenses went to Hamilton for lobbying purposes:

For law	$203,792.84
For Hamilton	89,749.00
1901.
For law	212,773.55
For Hamilton	107,809.35
1902.
For law	172,632.37
For Hamilton	50,000.00
1903.
For law	254,793.95
For Hamilton	88,126.35
1904.
For law	172,698.42
For Hamilton	140,077.42
1905.
For law	87,222.01
For Hamilton	12,164.90
Legal expense total	1,103,920.14
A. Hamilton's total	476,927.02

In justification of these enormous payments to Hamilton, Mr. McCall said:

At the beginning of each year every executive officer of every insurance company looks forward to the next five or six months with the utmost apprehension. For with each recurring year we are simply badgered to death in every State in the Union by a flood of legislative bills.

Sometimes these bills are introduced by men of honor, but generally they emanate from people who aim solely at "striking" at the insurance companies.

I may safely say that three-quarters of the bills introduced are blackmailing bills, simon pure, and it is the experience which we have had with these that makes the management of every insurance company fairly tremble at the beginning of each year.

The kind of work done by Hamilton under instructions from McCall is shown by the answers made by the latter to the questions of Mr. Hughes, counsel for the investigating committee. Some of these questions and answers are as follows:

Q. Was Mr. Hamilton expected to deal with the men who could produce the best results?—A. Yes. He was instructed to get the best fellow he could get.
Q. Lawyer, or any other man?—A. Yes.
Q. The right man retained in the right place could bring about the kind of legislation you desired for your company?—A. Yes.
Q. You know that some of those men who are thus retained represent other interests also in the legislatures?—A. Yes.
Q. And these men are so powerful that any legislator who opposes their wishes is apt to go out of politics?—A. Well, I can't say as to that, but I do believe his relations with politics do become strained.

Mr. William Barnes, an attorney for the associated life insurance companies, who cooperated with Hamilton and a man who had been superintendent of insurance, shows how effective these methods prove. In his testimony before the Armstrong committee, November 10, 1905, he said:

I recollect when I was superintendent that a judge who was turned out of office in 1873 carried around in his pocket an injunction, a temporary injunction, and the appointment of a receiver, for weeks, threatening the Mutual Life, to put it in the hands of a receiver. Fortunately that judge was put where he could not issue any injunctions or receiverships.

W. F. Thummel, a member of the "law department" of the Mutual Life, was on the witness stand October 6, 1905. He told how the States were divided up between the companies. The Mutual took care of legislation in Virginia, North Carolina, Alabama, Kentucky, Ohio, Michigan, Washington, Oregon, and New Mexico. The Equitable had Maryland, South Carolina, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, Texas, Colorado, Arkansas, California, and Nevada. The New York Life had Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Tennessee, and Oklahoma. And the rest of the territory was generally regarded as open to be handled as situations might arise. He also told how the expenses of the work were divided by the three companies. He favored Federal control of life insurance on the ground that it would relieve the companies of the necessity of combating the innumerable "strike bills;" which he said "are now introduced in the State legislatures in order that the authors of them may get commissions from the insurance companies for killing them."

This testimony shows that the three great insurance companies of the United States, the greatest moneyed corporations in all the world, are managed by men so weak that they "fairly tremble at the beginning of each year" lest the legislature which they have corrupted should turn upon them and pass some law by means of which the policy holders might sue them for an accounting.

This testimony of Messrs. Maine, McCall, and Thurman further shows that, up to the present time, the organized life-insurance lobby has been uniformly successful in defeating legislation hostile to the interests of the life insurance oligarchy. It shows, moreover, that blackmailing methods have often been used by the oligarchy themselves; that some of the men retained by the oligarchy are so powerful, by reason of representing other great interests, such as railroads, that "any legislator who opposes their wishes is apt to go out of politics"—"that his relations with politics do become strained."

A bill to compel life insurance companies to include the whole contract between the parties in the policy when issued was recently defeated in the New York legislature by the life insurance companies; and since they do not professedly oppose any but blackmailing bills, that must have been considered such a bill by those companies. State Senator Brackett, who introduced it, says that for many years "the simplest bill affecting life insurance has needed the approval of the companies before it stood a ghost's show of passing."

It is said by Mr. Alfred Maine, associate auditor of the Equitable Life, in his testimony before the legislative investigating committee, on September 29, 1905, that Judge Andrew Hamilton, of Albany; Mr. W. F. Thummel, of New York City, and other eminent lawyers were paid jointly by the New York Life, the Mutual Life, and the Equitable to appear before the committees of State legislatures for the purpose of defeating all legislation not desired by them, and to modify or repeal all objectionable laws already on the State books; and that in 1886 and 1889 Hamilton had been paid by the Equitable for the performance of such work in Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Missouri, and Wisconsin. It has since been discovered that Hamilton alone has been paid $711,000 for use in such work by the three companies. This does not include the sums paid him by the Prudential and Metropolitan. The Equitable, having no "law department" of its own, employed Mr. Hamilton, of the New York Life, and Mr. Short and Mr. Thummel, of the Mutual Life, and paid one-third of the total expense of the joint lobby system. Mr. Maine explained this arrangement by examples. He said, for instance, that a payment made by the Equitable to Hamilton on April 28, 1903, amounting to $13,333.33, for work done in Wisconsin and neighboring States, was one-third of $40,000, which was the total cost of that work; the other two companies paying $26,666.66. And similarly with other payments made to Hamilton—$1,333.33 on June 7, 1895; on October 12, 1897, $333.33, and $7,666.66 on April 8, 1899, these sums representing one-third of the total payment in each case; the other two-thirds being paid by the other parties to this lobbying compact. Some of the vouchers produced in evidence are illuminating. One of them runs thus:

The Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States to Andrew Hamilton, debtor, to balance for services and disbursements in re nonforfeiture facts and report, statutes and amendments, $1,333.33.
Received payment.

ANDREW HAMILTON.

And here is another:

NEW YORK, January 17, 1895.

The Equitable Life Assurance Society to Andrew Hamilton, Dr.
To services in matter of two-year surrender-value repeal, etc., Missouri, $500.
Received payment.

ANDREW HAMILTON.

Senator JOHN F. DRYDEN, President of the Prudential, was on the witness stand last Tuesday. I quote from the Evening Sun's report of his testimony:

President DRYDEN testified that the following political contributions had been made by the Prudential to the Republican national committee: Six thousand dollars in 1896, $10,000 in 1900, and $10,000 in 1904. A statement of the legal expenses of the company was read by Mr. Hughes. Under the item "In connection with legislation" were the following sums: Four hundred and eight dollars and thirty-four cents in 1896, $9,137.63 in 1897, $4,560 in 1898, $15,000 in 1899, $3,843.32 in 1900, $3,703.43 in 1901, $3,152.40 in 1902, none in 1903, $7,276.50 in 1904, and $2,500 in 1905 up to September 1. Thus the total sum spent for legislation during the past ten years is about $50,000. The witness testified that the statement read was correct.

Mr. Hughes asked how the $15,000 spent for legislation in 1899 was divided.

"A payment to Andrew Hamilton accounted for $5,000 of it," was the Senator's reply. "He was a man of wide authority in insurance matters. He had written a book which attracted my attention, and I sent for him." The witness said he could not remember what was the particular service performed by "Judge" Hamilton, except that it had to do with legislation of "the usual kind" in Illinois.

In the same year the Prudential paid James H. Blood, of Denver, $7,500 to urge the repeal of a Colorado law prohibiting the insurance of children.

The Prudential also paid the Metropolitan Life $3,377 in 1899 as its share in legislative expenses.

The Prudential campaign contributions, testified the witness, were charged to "expense" in two cases and to "legal expenses" in the third.

Another great abuse is that different and conflicting reports are made under oath by the New York Life and other companies to the superintendent of insurance in different States. This fact was brought out by counsel for the investigating committee on September 28, 1905, and again on the 14th of December, yesterday. This point is so important that I reproduce the New York World's report of the testimony regarding it:

Profits made by the New York Life on sales of its securities during 1901 was taken up by Mr. Hughes. He read from the report of the company to the State insurance department on December 31, 1901, in which it was declared that these profits amounted to $3,075,371.99. He asked Mr. Perkins to explain this entry, in view of the fact that the profits of the company from the sales of securities during that year were $5,253,541.57. Mr. Perkins explained the discrepancy by saying that a number of deductions had been made as follows: To reduce the book value of real estate, $843,980, and agents' balances, $1,919,324, making a total of $2,763,715.

Mr. Hughes brought out the fact that the agents' balances did not amount that year to $1,919,324, but that the actual total was only $1,622,830, and that the difference, $296,904, actually came from the company's suspense account. Mr. Perkins disputed these figures until Mr. Hughes produced a copy of the New York Life's report for December 31, 1901, made for the State insurance department of Massachusetts. It developed that the report of the company to that State was different in many respects from its report made to the insurance department of this State.

On yesterday (December 14) Mr. Edgar Moier, actuary of the Provident Savings Life Assurance Company, testified that the statements of the gains and losses of that company, which were submitted by the company to the insurance departments of Wisconsin and Connecticut, were at variance with the records on the books of the company and inaccurate.

Then there is the matter of exorbitant salaries and commissions. For instance, the salary of Richard A. McCurdy, president of the Mutual Life, is $150,000 a year; the salary and commissions of his son, Robert H. McCurdy, the general manager, amount to $127,000 a year, and the commissions of Louis A. Thebaud, a son-in-law of Richard A. McCurdy, and a member of the firm of C. H. Raymond & Co., who are the New York agents of the Mutual Life, amount to $147,000 a year. Robert H. McCurdy swore on the witness stand that he did not know what his father's salary was, or how much his brother-in-law received as commissions; and Richard A. McCurdy swore that he knew nothing, "one way or the other," about the salaries or commissions paid either to his son or son-in-law.

A similar condition existed in the New York Life. The salary of Mr. John A. McCall, its president, was $100,000; that of John C. McCall, his son, was $15,000; that of Mr. Alfred McQuaid, one of his sons-in-law, was $15,000; that of Mr. Darvin P. Kingsley, another son-in-law, was $15,000; that of Mr. J. C. Burrill, another relative, was $7,500.

The salary of Mr. J. W. Alexander, president of the Equitable Life, was $100,000, and that of Mr. J. H. Hyde, first vice-president, was the same.

Mr. John R. Hegeman, president of the Metropolitan, received $100,000 a year, and Mr. Haley Fiske, vice-president, $75,000.

The extravagance of these salaries may be best illustrated by comparison. The chief executive of the Bank of England receives a salary of $10,000 a year. The president of the Bank of Germany receives $7,500. The Secretary of the Treasury of the United States receives $8,000. The President of the United States receives $50,000.

As a result of the financial methods and wasteful extravagance which have characterized the management of the great life insurance companies of New York since 1890, the dividends to policy holders have been reduced to almost nothing, the surplus earned has been steadily reduced, the ratio of surplus earned to income has been reduced, and all this has happened while the actual income has been enormously increased. For instance, the income of the Mutual, the New York Life, and the Equitable in 1903 was in the aggregate $239,371,595. The surplus earned was only $3,208,085; the ratio of surplus earned to income was 1.34 per cent; the dividends to policy holders were only $12,228,000.

In comparison with this showing, I find that the Northwestern Mutual, the Mutual Benefit, the Union Central, the Connecticut Mutual, the Massachusetts Mutual, the Penn Mutual, the National Life, the Ætna Life, and the New England Mutual, nine companies, which are not engaged in Wall street affairs, had an aggregate income of $114,676,532, while their surplus earned amounted to $12,925,568, and the ratio of surplus earned to dividends was 11.27 per cent. The dividends to policy holders was $12,901,023. It will be seen that while these companies received considerably less than one-half of the income received by "The Big Three," they paid in dividends to their policy holders nearly $700,000 more, and that the ratio of surplus earned to income in the case of these minor companies was many times greater than in the case of "The Big Three."

Exhibits of the business of the Mutual Life for 1873 and 1903, respectively, illustrate the lamentable decadence of that institution:

Premium income	$17,818,889	$60,151,020
Dividends to policy holders	$8,397,676	$2,985,061
Ratio dividends to premium receipts.....per cent..	43.13	4.96
Management expenses	$1,889,285	$16,079,896
Ratio management expenses to premium income, per cent	13.44	26.73

In 1903 the aggregate expenses of the three largest savings banks in New York City were as follows: Salaries, $282,270; other expenses, $155,231; total expenses, $438,001. For the same year the aggregate expenses of the "The Big Three" life insurance companies were: Salaries, $2,849,220; other expenses, $37,738,413; total expenses, $40,587,633.

In view of all this, it is not surprising that the public has witnessed quarrels and scandals in the management of these three giant corporations, which seem to have conducted their business outside the domain of law and without regard to any moral standard. It is fortunate indeed that the country was not thrown into a financial panic by the methods of the men who managed those companies. That such a panic was imminent we are told by one of the greatest financiers in America. On the 8th of December, 1905, when Mr. Thomas F. Ryan was on the witness stand before the Armstrong committee, the following colloquy occurred between him and Mr. Hughes, the counsel for that committee:

Q. Will you state, Mr. Ryan, what led you to make the purchase?—A. I had very large interests that were sure to be affected seriously by any disturbance in the financial situation or confidence in New York, or any disaster that might come. I saw in the virtual certainty of a receivership of the Equitable Life such a disaster impending unless the factional differences in the company among the directors and the management of the company should be radically changed. To avert this and to prevent the frightful losses that would occur from the violent breaking up of the Equitable, not only to the policy holders, but to the financial community at large—myself as well—I thought that some one ought to undertake the business or——

Q. (Interrupting.) Or the acquisition of the stock?

A. Yes, sir; or in some way to stop the trouble that might ensue. The gentlemen connected with the large insurance companies did not seem to be in that position—I mean the financial people downtown—and I had never had any connection with the three big insurance companies except as a policy holder in each. I felt, therefore, free to act.

My first idea was to get together a number of policy holders who would take this company out of the hands in which it was going to destruction and give it a clean management, economical and efficient, and restore its prosperity for the benefit of all honest interests. I soon concluded that the amounts that could be obtained from disinterested people, people who had no axes to grind, would be very small, so I concluded to do it myself.

Q. Had you heard that there were gentlemen in Wall street who had made propositions to Mr. Hyde for the purchase of his stock?

A. There had been some such rumors, but I knew nothing about them.

Q. Did you regard it as a matter of moment whether the control of the stock should be bought up by men interested in financial enterprises who might have, as you expressed it a moment ago, "axes to grind?"

A. Well, I think it might be considered—might have been considered unwise.

Q. You were fully appreciative of the opportunities that might exist if persons desirous of furthering their own interests acquired control of that stock?

A. I can imagine that it might have been detrimental to the institution.

Q. Yes. You understand, of course, that the control of the large accumulations that such an institution as the Equitable has might be a decided advantage in connection with financial enterprises?

A. I can imagine that.

It must be confessed that Mr. Ryan has performed a great service, yet only a temporary service.

The State of New York, aroused by the criticisms of the rest of the world, and acting under the leadership of the great lawyer and honest man who has so ably and fairly conducted the examination as counsel for the Armstrong committee, will no doubt institute reforms; but those reforms will prove ephemeral and evanescent. The same spiders of finance who have woven their webs at Albany in the past will weave new and stronger webs in the future, unless the incentive is taken away by the certainty that any scheme originating in Wall street for robbing the people of other States under the cloak of a New York statute will be futile, by reason of Federal laws for the protection of our national banking system and the people of the States against their schemes of exploitation.

TAXATION AND SUPERVISION.

Mr. Chairman, when I read the evidence taken before the Armstrong committee it appeared to me to be unjust that national banks should be taxed on their capital stock and deposits, while the New York trust companies, conducted as "channels" of the insurance companies, were untaxed in respect to either. It occurred to me that fair play demanded the taxation of those institutions which were engaged directly or indirectly in the banking business; and hence I drew a bill with the primary object of taxing such institutions. And since, under our political system, the visitorial power usually and necessarily accompanies Federal taxation, it seemed to me of no consequence whether the proposition was designated a bill to extend the visitorial power of the Government over them or whether it was called a bill to tax, supervise, and control them. Whatever you call the measure, its substance involves both taxation and supervision, and both are necessary.

Taxation is necessary in order to protect honest national banks against unfair competition, and supervision and control are necessary to protect the Government and its agencies, and to carry out the scheme of taxation, also to protect the honest banks and to prevent the manifold abuses resulting from the present system. I have discussed only a few of these abuses. A summary of them may be stated as follows:

(1) Secrecy in the transactions of insurance companies of New York State, under section 56 of the insurance law of that State.

(2) The system of deferred dividends and tontine policies, which has arisen under section 97 of the same law.

(3) The complex relationship between the great insurance companies and the so-called "trust companies," under section 156 of chapter 690 of the New York banking law of 1892, which authorized the organization of trust companies with extraordinary powers.

(4) The participation of certain insurance companies in transactions known as "syndicates" and "joint accounts," by means of which the officers, trustees, and directors of the insurance companies enter into speculations in Wall street at the risk of the companies and yet share in the profits, if any, but manage to shift the losses, when losses occur, upon the shoulders of the policy holders exclusively.

(5) The unlawful practice which has arisen among the managers of the great life insurance companies, who are also the business managers of large banks, railroad companies, steel corporations, and the like, of acting in dual capacities, and diverting the money of the insurance companies into banking and speculative enterprises at the expense of the policy holders.

(6) A general disregard of the laws prohibiting the falsification of accounts, and requiring correct annual reports of the business of the insurance companies to be made to the State authorities.

(7) The employment of lobbyists; the use of corrupt means to influence legislation, and the payment of blackmailers who threaten or attempt to expose mismanagement on the part of the companies.

(8) The payment of extravagant salaries, commissions, pensions, and bonuses to officers, trustees, directors, attorneys, lobbyists, agents, and favorites, and the bribing of the agents of competing life insurance companies.

(9) Wasteful extravagance in efforts to get new business in this country and foreign countries at the expense of legitimate policy holders.

If it were not for the New York legislation of 1890 and 1892, which I have already characterized as affirmative wrongdoing, none of the abuses above enumerated could have been persistently practiced. It is necessary to examine that legislation, therefore, in order to expose the mischief and provide a proper remedy.

On May 22, 1890, the New York legislature passed "An act in relation to life and casualty insurance companies, associations, and societies," which was incorporated in the revised insurance law of the State as section 56 in 1896. Section 56 is in these words:

No order, judgment, or decree, providing for an accounting or enjoining, restraining, or interfering with the prosecution of the business of any domestic insurance corporation, or appointing a temporary or permanent receiver thereof, shall be made or granted otherwise than upon the application of the attorney-general on his own motion or after his approval of a request in writing therefor of the superintendent of insurance, except in an action by a judgment creditor or in proceedings supplementary to execution. (See Birdseye's R. S., second edition, vol. 2, p. 1622.)

Having secured this gag law, depriving policy holders and those for whose benefit the insurance was made of the right to sue for an accounting, or the appointment of a receiver, or for an injunction, there was in 1892 a general revision of the insurance and banking laws of the State for the evident purpose of placing the great insurance companies in a position to utilize their vast income and assets for the benefit of those who control them. (See chapters 689 and 690 of the New York laws of 1892.) Section 87 of chapter 690, which has been incorporated into the present insurance law of New York as section 97, professed to remove the restrictions as to the payment of dividends, and amended the previous law so as to allow the companies "to make and pay over dividends annually, or at longer intervals." The section, as a whole, reads thus:

Any domestic life insurance corporation which by its charter or articles of association is restricted to making a dividend once in two or more years, may hereafter, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in such charter or articles, make and pay over dividends annually, or at longer intervals, in the manner and proportions, and among the parties, provided for in such charter or articles.

Only one other law was needed to make these great insurance companies complete masters of the situation in the great financial center of the United States; and that desideratum was supplied by section 156 of chapter 689 of the banking law of 1892, which, among other privileges, conferred upon trust companies the right "to receive deposits of trust moneys, securities, and other personal property from any person or corporation, and to loan on real or personal securities."

This provision is the parent of the Morristown Trust Company, the Morton Trust Company, the United States Mortgage and Trust Company, the Mercantile Trust Company, the Equitable Trust Company, the Metropolitan Trust Company, and half a score of others formed by the officers, trustees, and directors of the Mutual, the New York Life, the Equitable, and the Metropolitan life insurance companies. I quote the whole of this remarkable section of law for the information of the House:

Upon the filing of any such certificate of authorization of a trust company, the persons named therein, and their successors, shall thereupon and thereby become a corporation, and in addition to the powers conferred by the general and stock corporation laws, shall have power:

1. To act as the fiscal or transfer agent of any State, municipality, body politic, or corporation; and such capacity to receive and disburse money, and transfer, register, and countersign certificates of stock and other evidences of indebtedness.

2. To receive deposits of trust moneys, securities, and other personal property from any person or corporation; and to loan money on real or personal securities.

3. To lease, hold, purchase, and convey all real property necessary to the transaction of its business, or which the purposes of the corporation may require, or which it shall acquire in satisfaction or partial satisfaction of debts due the corporation, under sales, judgments, or mortgages, or in settlement or partial settlement of debts due the corporation by any of its debtors.

4. To act as trustee under any mortgage or bond issued by any municipality, body politic, or corporation, and accept or execute any other municipal or corporate trust not inconsistent with the laws of this State.

5. To accept trusts from and execute trusts from married women in respect to their separate property, and to be their agent in the management of such property, or to transact any business in relation thereto.

6. To act, under the order or appointment of any court of record, as guardian, receiver, or trustee of the estate of any minor the annual income of which shall not be less than $100, and as depositary of any moneys paid into court, whether for the benefit of any such minor, or other person, corporation, or party.

7. To take, accept, and execute any and all such legal trusts, duties, and powers, in regard to holding, management, and disposition of any estate, real or personal, and the rents and profits thereon, or the sale thereof, as may be granted or certified to it by any court of record or by any person, corporation, municipality, or other authority; and it shall be accountable to all parties in interest for the faithful discharge of every such trust, duty, or power which it may so accept.

8. To take, accept, and execute all such trusts and powers, of whatever nature or description, as may be conferred upon or intrusted or committed to it by any person or persons, or by any body politic, corporation, or other authority by grant, assignment, transfer, devise, bequest, or otherwise, or which may be intrusted or committed or transferred to it or vested in it by order of any court of record or any surrogate; and to receive and take and hold any property or estate, real or personal, which may be the subject of any such trust.

10. To be appointed and to accept the appointment of executor of or trustee under the last will and testament, or administrator with or without the will annexed, of the estate of any deceased person, and to be appointed as to act as the committee of the estates of lunatics, idiots, persons of unsound minds, and habitual drunkards. (Laws of New York, 1892, vol. 2, pp. 1908–1910.)

With these laws of New York before us, laws which affect every insurance policy holder in the United States; laws which render the national-banking system insecure and less efficient; laws which grant privileges to one set of corporations without the payment of any tax or duty, while the national-bank act taxes another set of corporations engaged in the same business—with all this before us, who will be so bold as to say that we have not as much right to tax and supervise and control the mongrel insurance trust companies of New York as we have to tax State banks of issue, or to tax filled cheese, oleomargarine, or patent medicines? Whether taxation is the condition precedent to visitation, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] contends, or whether the right to supervise is the condition precedent to taxation, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] contends, the fact is that both rights exist as concomitants of the power of Congress to pass laws to "provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." It was upon this theory that the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the great bank cases of McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheaton, 316), Farmers' Bank v. Dearing (91 U. S., 29), and Bank v. Nebeker (167 U. S., 196) were predicated. This Government has the right to establish a national banking system. If it has that right, it has, as a corollary, the right to safeguard that system. It may lay a tax or duty as a means of safeguarding it. Judge Harlan's opinion in Bank v. Nebeker establishes that point. The end carries the means along with it if the end itself is legitimate, unless the means are specially prohibited. Chief Justice Marshall's opinion in McCulloch v. Maryland establishes this point. Congress has the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises" in order "to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." From whatever point of view we look at this matter we have the power to pass the legislation which I have proposed. And having the power to do so, I am convinced that under the circumstances it is our duty to do so.

As to the question of concurrent jurisdiction by the States and the United States, for which my bill provides, my impression is that it is entirely analogous in principle to the concurrent jurisdiction exercised by the two governments over the subject of pilotage or the building of bridges over navigable streams. The decided cases on these points are numerous. I think the subject falls within the scope of that class of legislation which the States may enact in the absence of legislation by Congress and in which State laws are abrogated by Federal legislation only to the extent to which such legislation fairly construed may reach. My scheme is not predicated upon the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. If it were, it would deprive the States of the right to tax the corporations affected by it, and that is not my object.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have answered the questions of the gentleman from South Carolina as well as I could. I have spoken plainly of the abuses that have been disclosed in New York, and especially of those statutes which, to my mind, constitute the ugliest and most dangerous features of the whole wretched business. Since I have listened to this debate I am more than ever convinced of the necessity of extending the sovereign visitorial power of the United States over the corporations which have grown up in Wall street under those statutes. I am of the opinion that the plan which I have proposed offers an effectual remedy for the mischief, and is perhaps the only sure remedy attainable.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I surrender the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is recognized.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I desire to add much to what I said earlier in the day, but certain remarks made by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] have made it seem to me proper that I should say a few words. The House always listens with great delight to the gentleman, and wisely so, and yet I never hear him make a speech without being reminded of a story that was once told by Huxley, when he said that "Herbert Spencer's conception of a tragedy was the destruction of a syllogism by a fact." And when the distinguished gentleman declined to yield to me on the ground that he would illustrate the tendency and purpose of his speech if I would only be patient, I could not help but think that he was considering the possibility of a destruction of one of his syllogisms by a fact. And it was just such a fact that I think necessary to bring to the attention of this House.

The point that I made in my speech, and that I desire to emphasize because of the very eloquent denial of it made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] is this: That there can be no more immoral practice than for members of a legislative body to use the taxing power, which is given them for the sole purpose of raising revenue, for some other and ulterior purpose. I not only maintain that, but, despite the fact that my reading may not be as extensive or along the same line as that of the gentleman, I maintain that where the taxing power has been used in support of the liberties of the English people it has been along the line of a denial of appropriations rather than the line of diverting it from its real purpose into other purposes not germane to revenue raising.

But if that be not historically true the gentleman overlooks this distinction—that in England there is not the limitation of power that there is in regard to our National Government. Here the taxing power is expressly given for one purpose and one purpose only, and the Supreme Court has had occasion repeatedly to declare that police power did not exist in the National Government.

The gentleman paints a wonderful picture of certain conditions. He tells you of the enormous power wealth has, how it is overriding the weak and the helpless. He tells you of the greed and the avarice of man; and yet, pointing out as only his eloquent tongue can, the absolute crimes of these men of wealth, he would in the same breath have this House guilty of the immorality of disregarding the Constitution, disregarding its oath, and using a power that is expressly granted for another purpose. The gentleman will not set an example of high morality that will cure an evil by committing another evil; it does not matter what object may be desired. I have never subscribed to that doctrine that the end justifies the means, and I am not prepared to do so to-day. I would hate to see this House go on record disregarding the Constitution for the purpose of attaining an object, however praiseworthy.

The gentleman's speech suggests that action should be taken here, but not a word practically of what the legislation should be. He tells you truly what the conditions are which permit the accumulation of such wealth and power in the hands of a few men; rightly says it is an intolerable condition, but he might have added that it was in the domain of the States to-day, as it has always been in their domain, to limit the size and the power of these corporations.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a statement?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, I will extend the courtesy that the gentleman declined to extend to me.

Mr. COCKRAN. Do I understand that the gentleman considers there is anything immoral in the use of a power granted by the Constitution for a purpose considered salutary by the body exercising it?

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably I do; I consider that when I agree to support the Constitution that I mean what I say, and I believe that the taxing power is a limited power, given to the Congress of the United States for the purpose of raising revenue only, and that I am morally guilty of a wrong if I use it for some other purpose than raising revenue.

Mr. COCKRAN. Where does he find any such limitation on the power as he describes?

Mr. SHERLEY. I find the limitation upon the right to levy taxes all through the Constitution.

Mr. COCKRAN. Where?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, well, if the gentleman expects my memory to be so remarkable that I can quote the whole instrument to him I am sorry to disappoint him.

Mr. COCKRAN. I am not asking the gentleman to quote the whole instrument, but any part or one word which justifies his statement.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will give the gentleman the name of a case where the Supreme Court of the United States has justified it, and that is the case of United States v. De Witt (9 Wallace), which the gentleman has doubtless read; and I will give him another case—the license cases.

Mr. COCKRAN. I have not asked the gentleman for any legislative construction whatever, because the whole theory of my speech was that we must consider for ourselves how we will exercise the powers clearly bestowed on us.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course that makes further argument futile. I have not reached that point of personal egotism where I am willing to put my construction against the construction given in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. COCKRAN. If the gentleman will allow me, I have not the egotism to confound myself with the House. I spoke of the House, not of myself.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, returning to the merit of the matter rather than to any exchange of witticism, in which I do not profess to be a match for the eloquent gentleman from New York, I desire to again state what is the actual proposition now confronting the House. If we are to permit the size of a problem or the evil in an existing state of affairs to make us disregard the powers that remain among the people in their State government, and to come to the National Government for aid, then the intelligent practical thing to do is to abolish the restrictions that now exist upon the national power, make our power as broad as the gentleman's opinion of it is, so that we may consider not how to do a thing, but simply what we want to do.

The point I wanted to make, and that I desire to emphasize, is that if the States do not use their power, then by not using it they will cease to have the capacity to use it, and as a result of that we will see a concentration and centralization such as the world never saw before. And in that connection it is a curious fact that the loudest advocates to-day for national control are the same distinguished gentlemen whom the gentleman from New York described in such glowing and accurate terms. They are the presidents of the life insurance companies themselves.

Mr. COCKRAN. If the gentleman will allow me for a moment, I do not like to interrupt so much——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. COCKRAN. It will probably save the gentleman a great deal of trouble if I remind him that I have argued against Federal supervision. I have argued against Federal regulation. I have argued in favor of exercising the Federal power to remit life insurance to the control of each State, as savings banks are remitted to it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has expired.

Mr. COCKRAN. I hope the gentleman will be given additional time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. SHERLEY. In response to the last suggestion of the gentleman from New York I can only say that as the law now stands the matter is entirely within the hands of the State, and was so expressly declared in Paul versus Virginia, and if we come into their domain we complicate the question instead of clarifying it. The gentleman makes quite a speech on the fact that the commissioner of New York, instead of investigating and exposing conditions there, has been one of the causes that permitted them to go undiscovered. I do not deny the accuracy of the statement, but if the gentleman is going to make a plea on the ground of the inefficiency of an individual officer, then he has destroyed all legislative and governmental activity. If the fact that that commissioner is a bad commissioner is sufficient ground for the State not to engage in any further investigation or regulation, what guaranty can the gentleman give that a commissioner of the United States Government will be any better official?

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman must realize that I am opposed to the creation of a United States commissioner and of everything with such an object in view. But will the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; for a question. I have only two or three minutes longer.

Mr. COCKRAN. Then finish your remarks.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; go ahead with your question.

Mr. COCKRAN. I was going to ask the gentleman if his contention was that the present control by the States is what he desires to maintain?

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably.

Mr. COCKRAN. And yet the present control by the States has produced these infamies?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; the absence of control by the States has produced these conditions.

Mr. COCKRAN. The absence of its exercise. I think the gentleman will not deny that the States have the control of the subject, if they choose to exercise it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, the gentleman uses the word "control" in a double sense.

Mr. COCKRAN. I will change it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, they have theoretical control, but they have not exercised control.

Mr. COCKRAN. I merely wanted to get the statement of the gentleman before the House, so that we would all understand it. I will change the word from "control" to "jurisdiction." I understand from the gentleman that he contends the proper remedy for these conditions is to maintain the existing State jurisdiction. Am I right in that?

Mr. SHERLEY. With due apology, I think I can put my position so that the House may understand it, even if the gentleman from New York does not. I contend this, that it is proper for the States to exercise the functions that belong to them, among which would be the control of insurance. Whether that control should take the line that the gentleman suggests, of limiting the action of corporations to State lines, limiting their size, or what not, is a question of expediency about which now I do not profess to be able to answer. The point I make is this, that whenever you get to the position of saying that the State government is inefficient to handle a thing simply because it is big, and that therefore it must come to the National Government, then you have struck at the very foundations of Anglo-Saxon government. You have by the disuse of a function in the course of time created a condition where its use may not be possible, and you have produced a condition, in attempting to cure one evil, that will be infinitely worse. You will have a centralization of government that will be infinitely worse than anything this country has ever seen.

Mr. COCKRAN. Now, may I put my question? Am I correct in assuming the gentleman's contention is that the true way to remedy conditions is to maintain the present jurisdiction? Am I correct in that?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. COCKRAN. That is to say, the conditions which have produced this infamous state of affairs are the conditions that will cure it?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no; the gentleman is witty, but not accurate. The conditions that have produced this condition of affairs have been the nonuse by the State of the powers that belong to it, and the cure of these conditions is the use by the State government of the powers that belong to it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired and the gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. SHERLEY. But, Mr. Chairman, did I not have some time in my own right reserved?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I be recognized in my own time to yield to the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will answer the question put by the gentleman from Kentucky. He has reserved out of his own time fifteen minutes that he may occupy. The Chair asks the gentleman from Kentucky whether he proposes to speak in his own time?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Chair will so recognize me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; a question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think that if the State of New York and the State of Pennsylvania were able to manage their own insurance affairs it would relieve the rest of the United States of this incubus?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think there is power in the States to control the entire situation. Now, it is plausible to say that inasmuch as these corporations extend outside of the State line that you had better come to the National Government, whose jurisdiction also extends beyond State lines. I say that is plausible. Of course it has its advantages, but the disadvantages will lie in the fact that by virtue of it you are taking the government away from the people; you are putting it where it will not have the effectiveness it would if the power remained at home. You are enabling these very people, who are so powerful—as the gentleman says, more powerful than any government now—to deal with one particular government, with one power, instead of having to deal with the governments of the various States.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I base my question on the assumption that about two-thirds of all the insurance done in the United States is written by companies in New York and Pennsylvania.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, and when we create a condition of State morality that will not permit the organization of a corporation in a State for the purpose of preying upon the citizens of other States we will have solved one-half of the problems presented to the American people. And until you do create a State sentiment that will give you proper laws in your State you can not solve the question by giving over the power of control to the National Government.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that I understood the gentleman from Kentucky. I should be greatly obliged if he will make one or two points clear. Now, before the gentleman from Tennessee occupied his attention, I understood the gentleman from Kentucky to say that he believed in maintaining the present jurisdiction of the State upon this question of insurance. Under this jurisdiction the conditions of which we complain have arisen. Is not that so?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, the gentleman from New York is too good a logician to expect me to answer a question—what might be termed almost a trick question. It is true that these conditions have arisen where the States have had the jurisdiction they now have, but I said to the gentleman from New York that it was not because they had the jurisdiction; it was because they had not used the power that is given to them.

Mr. COCKRAN. And now the gentleman's remedy is to leave the State to pursue the same system of disuse of powers as they have heretofore?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; but I have a little more confidence, a little more faith, in the people than even the distinguished commoner who has interrogated me. I believe under the lash of an aroused public opinion the State legislatures will awake to their duty and do their duty, and I do not want them to be checked in their newly awakened activity by the National Government stepping into the domain. [Applause.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Now, go a step further. If the gentleman's anticipations are correct and the rosy picture he has drawn should be realized, his position would be unquestioned. But suppose he is disappointed. Suppose, two years from now, this investigation having ceased to be a nine days' wonder and this house cleaning having resulted, as is not improbable, in mere substitution of new agents to carry on the same old practices, what, then, would be his conception of a remedy?

Mr. SHERLEY. My position about that is my position about the great subject of government in general. Because I have seen the people fail, because I have seen abuse prosper, because I have seen the wicked and the powerful flourish as the green bay tree, it has not made me believe less in the people, but only more. The day may be postponed, but the day is not going to be brought nearer by saying to the people, "You must not use your power." It is not going to be brought nearer by concentrating the power a long way from home. It is going to be brought nearer and made more certain by making the people realize that in their own hands, on their own heads, the sin and the saving lies. They must go to work themselves, and they must do it through their agencies at home. [Applause.]

Mr. COCKRAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] if the power of the Federal Government is any less the power of the people than the power of the town, the power of the county, or the power of the State?

Mr. SHERLEY. I shall answer the gentleman in this way, and when I have answered I shall not further detain the House by this dissertation between the two of us, because I remember the gentleman's suggestion that I should not have the egotism to think that I constitute the House or that my private views and an explanation of them was the only matter of discussion. I will answer the gentleman in this way, that my conception of government, and the Democratic conception of government, has been, first, that that government which governs least governs best; second, that that government which stays closest home to the people is most democratic and less liable to abuse, less liable to get beyond control. It is easier for the people of the State of New York to know something of their State government than it is for them to know something of their National Government. It is easier for the people of Kentucky to know more about their State government than they do about the National Government. The fact that they do not know it is not a contradiction of my statement. They could know it. This I know, that when this country started on its career the State legislatures contained the ablest of men; that the time was when men resigned from the National Congress to take a seat in their State legislature. That may have been a false position, but it is not half so false a position as that which to-day makes your State legislature a disregardable body, and to which are sent men who are not capable of broad statecraft. And I say to you if there is any hope for the redemption of America, though the picture be as black as the gentleman has painted it, the hope lies in going back to the people and letting them learn the old lesson that they can not shirk responsibility, can not shift it off to another forum and expect relief; they must get it at home, and that thought was the cause of and excuse for my speech this morning. [Applause.]

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MCMORRAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, it is great good fortune to have listened to two such addresses as we have heard to-day, one from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], containing a clear analysis and sound and philosophical exposition of the status of this question in its relation to the Federal and the State governments—a statement of a lawyer, founded upon law, cool and clear; the other, an eloquent denunciation of wrong and vice and criminality in high place and an exposition of the underlying ethics, excelled by nothing that I have ever heard upon this floor. The gentlemen from New York and from Kentucky agree in their conclusion, to wit, that the Federal Government has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of insurance. Now, Mr. Chairman, these speeches have been a public benefit, but they have been to some extent a personal injury, because they have cut out from under me many of the things that I desired to say, because these gentlemen have said them better. I shall, however, begin by saying that I agree with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that what the Irish call "home rule" is, as a rule, the most honest rule. [Applause.] It is honest for the reason that the men who are the "rulers," so called, the men in whom power is lodged, are neighbors of the men who lodge it, personal acquaintances of theirs—their characters intimately known—and because they exercise the power under the eyes of their neighbors and friends, who can at intervals withdraw it. I believe in it in an ascending scale, leaving power—in as far as can with safety be left—first to the individual, second to the family, third to the town, fourth to the county, fifth to the State, and sixth, and then only when the Constitution expressly or by necessary or obviously proper intendment delegates it, to the Federal Government. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] has correctly said that all the liberties of the English-speaking people were founded upon the assertion by the legislative body of the taxing power. That is true; and while he can argue by analogy to some extent between the British House of Commons and the American House of Representatives, he must remember the distinction between the two. While it is absolutely true that the House of Commons exercised its taxing power for the strengthening and enforcement and execution of the power which it had—a legislative power—it is also true that the British House of Commons had an unlimited and original and inherent legislative power and therefore the exercise of the taxing power in order to execute that legislative power was totally a different and a larger thing than ought to be the exercise of the taxing power by the House of Representatives, which has only a limited power, a delegated power.

Mr. Chairman, it can never happen that the power to tax can give jurisdiction over a subject-matter of taxation when dealing with the subject-matter is neither delegated to the General Government nor prohibited to the States. You must first have the jurisdiction over the subject-matter. Then there follows, as the auxiliary or enforcing clause, the power to tax, not only to raise revenue, but, if actual need be, to enforce the power. If you have the power over the subject-matter, you may tax, not only to bring a revenue, but to execute the power, if that be an obviously proper or necessary means to the end of exercising the power. For example, if the Federal Government has the power to forbid certain things, it may forbid them by taxation, let us say. I do not think the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] intended to leave the impression which he left upon the mind of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], to wit, that the Federal power had any specific, substantive power of taxation independently of all other powers granted or denied in the Constitution of the United States. The power to deal with the subject-matter must be there first. You ought never to form a nexus between a subject-matter over which you have no constitutional power and the Constitution itself by the assertion of it through the taxing power. Taxes are always means to an end, not in themselves an end. The end itself must be constitutional.

Now, I am perfectly aware of the fact there is a little weight in the Supreme Court decisions that would seem to squint the other way if unstudied, but it amounts to nothing if studied. Here is the Supreme Court of the United States stating in effect that it would not undertake to investigate the motives of Congress when exercising the taxing power. In other words, it is a compliment to Congress, to the legislative body from a coordinate branch, stating that it would not attribute to it the bad motive of obtaining jurisdiction simply by the assertion of the taxing power. It takes for granted integrity of motive, intellectual integrity. Now, Mr. Chairman, there are two forms of centralization by the Federal Government, one of which I am afraid we can not help and the other one we can help, I think. That centralization which proceeds from the exercise of clearly delegated power is a form of centralization which, I fear, must go on. In so far as Congress has not already exercised to the full its clearly delegated power it will in the course of history exercise it. Nor is there anything undemocratic in maintaining in full integrity the expressly delegated powers of the General Government. Jefferson said as much.

The other form of centralization, which is always vicious and an usurpation, is to assert Federal jurisdiction by a pretext, whether it be by the mere pretext of interstate commerce where no interstate commerce exists or whether it be by the pretext of the taxing power asserted as a connecting link with the trust that the court will not examine our motive; it is all the same; it is vicious and an usurpation. Now, let us come to this particular question, Mr. Chairman. The Supreme Court has spoken in this case and it has declared that insurance is not commerce of any sort and especially is it not interstate commerce. That disposes of the question as to whether there is any jurisdiction under the rule in the Committee on Interstate Commerce. To what committee it should go I myself am a little in doubt. My opinion was that it ought to have gone to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to investigate the jurisdictional power of the Federal Government and to report to this House, but the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary not having made a fight for the jurisdiction and the committee making none, we are faced with the alternative of sending it to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce or the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. MANN. Why can not you let it go without making any special reference of the resolution? Why not let it go according to the rules?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was about to say along that line that perhaps the best of all references would be to refer it to the Committee of the Whole House and let it be thrashed out there and done with, but I have not the power to do that here. I am reduced to this alternative of advocating one of these motions or the other before the House, and if I offered the other motion to go to Committee of the Whole to be there disposed of it would be voted down simply because a Democrat had offered it. I think this ought not to be a partisan question in any sense whatsoever.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have been informed there will be an amendment offered to send it to the Committee on the Judiciary, and on the strength of that statement I declined myself to offer an amendment. I understand such an amendment will be offered by the gentleman from Maine from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If this motion is coupled with instructions to the committee to examine and ascertain if Congress has any jurisdiction over the subject-matter, it seems to me it would be the proper committee to which it should go.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say, in answer to the gentleman's query about an amendment being submitted to refer it to the Judiciary Committee, that I have such an amendment in my pocket that has received the approbation of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], who is expecting to be called away before we reach that point of the resolution, and I am going to offer it as soon as opportunity is presented.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it accompanied with instructions to the committee to report upon the question whether Congress has any jurisdiction——

Mr. NORRIS. No, sir; it refers the whole matter of insurance to the Judiciary Committee. Now, if the gentleman will permit a further interruption, I was endeavoring to get the floor in order to explain the situation all afternoon, but have not been able to do so——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not yield now except for a question.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand, the Judiciary Committee have not taken an active part in it because they thought it would be perhaps out of place to ask that something should come to them, and they would rather the motion came from somebody else.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if the gentleman will let me finish. If that motion is coupled with instructions to the Committee on the Judiciary to report to this House whether the Federal Government has jurisdiction over the subject-matter, I shall indorse it, but if it is merely generally sent to the Judiciary Committee I do not see much advantage over sending it to that committee. There will arise the suspicion it was sent to the committee merely for the purpose of being smothered. There ougth to be a report upon the question of jurisdiction from whatever committee it comes before, and the proper committee to determine a jurisdictional fact is the Judiciary Committee, and therefore there ought to be instructions to that effect if it goes to the Committee on Judiciary, and I hope the gentleman will amend the resolution by embodying such instructions.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to suggest to the gentleman, if he will permit me, that I will have no objection to adding to the motion any instruction, as far as securing action is concerned from the Judiciary Committee. I would not want to instruct any specific action by way of bill or anything else, because I want to leave the committee perfectly free, so that they may give us their opinion, as a judiciary committee, as to what the proper course is, or whether we have any jurisdiction whatever.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, that the Members of the House may catch the reason for the distinction I have made, I will say that the Committee on the Judiciary has jurisdiction for the purpose of reporting to the House whether or not the Federal Government has jurisdiction. But, if they were to report to the House that the Federal Government did have jurisdiction, then the Judiciary Committee would not be the proper committee to deal with the subject-matter, because that would depend upon what ground they placed the constitutional jurisdiction of the Federal Government. If they placed it, for example, on the ground that it was interstate commerce, then the matter would go to that committee; if they would place it upon the ground that the exercise of the taxing power made a jurisdiction—an inconceivable thing for a lawyer to do—then it would go to the Committee on Ways and Means; if they said the Federal Government had no jurisdiction at all, then that would settle the matter. That is the reason why I would not vote for a general committal to the Judiciary Committee, while I would vote for a committal to the Judiciary Committee with instructions to report upon our jurisdiction. Now, let me proceed.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does not the message itself submit the question to the House simply? I find on page 16 the following:

I repeat my previous recommendation that the Congress should also consider whether the Federal Government has any power or owes any duty with respect to domestic transactions in insurance of an interstate character.

Is not the question submitted by the message, whether or not we have the power, and would a simple reference be a reference of that question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It would not. Unless it is a committal requiring investigation and report on the question of jurisdiction, then it is a committal for legislation as well. The President is no lawyer, I will say, in answer further to the gentleman. He admits that he is not. That is one of the things which he is not, which is accompanied by an omission on his part to that effect. There are not many things of that sort. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, to go further in connection with this taxing power nexus between the subject-matter and the Constitution of the United States, just suppose you could have jurisdiction over any possible subject-matter simply because you had the power of taxation, where would it stop? Why, it would be a blanket clause that would cover everything. Congress might to-morrow pass an act ordaining a direct tax upon lands and apportioning it between the States, and then, incidental to the power of taxation (if any power is to be exercised as incidental to taxation, when really taxation is itself only incidental to other and substantive powers, or itself substantive only to raise a revenue), the Congress could go on and in the same act enact the Henry George system of single tax. It could do anything, I do not care what. It could to-morrow tax barrels, and then it could legislate that the barrel should hold only so much, or should not hold less than so much, or should have so many hoops, or should contain nothing but water. The minute that gentlemen, on this side of the Chamber especially, ever surrender the idea that the taxing power can make a nexus between the subject-matter and the Constitution where no other nexus exists, then we have surrendered to federalism, and we might as well go out of business, because we as a party would have no right whatsoever to exist. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to talk a little about the subject-matter, although my friends from New York and Kentucky have left me no opportunity to grow eloquent upon the crimes and abuses of the present conditions, nor the advantages of preserving inviolate the reserved rights of the States as the sheet anchor of individuality and local self-government.

Mr. HEPBURN rose.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COCKS in the chair). Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me an interruption?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman from Mississippi has already spoken with relation to the taxing power and to the power that might be exercised under the commerce clause of the Constitution. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] has suggested that there is another power, lodged in the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, that each State shall be guaranteed a republican form of government. Will the gentleman, before he leaves this branch of the subject, give us his views as to the power that the Government of the United States may have to control an insurance company through its undoubted power to secure to a State a republican form of government?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will reply by saying that a republican form of government does not mean an honest government or incorrupt government, as all of us have ascertained in these latter days, and that the constitutional guaranty of a republican form of government is not a guaranty of honest administration of government. It is a high tribute to my friend from New York, his morals and his high ideals of republican government, that he should have led to an unconscious confusion of the two in that matter. There are a great many sorts of republican governments. Historically we find that there have been democratic republican governments like that of Athens, aristocratic republican governments like that of Sparta, plutocratic republican governments like that of Venice, and a mixed-up republican government like that we have—a republic of lesser republics, with two different sets of republican governments working along different lines with the power of the people over both checked—materially blocked in the Federal Government—by the Senate, and checked by the absolute veto of the Executive, neither of which is consistent with a pure democracy, but both quite consistent with a republican form of government. Undoubtedly what our forefathers meant by the phrase was a government of law and not a government of one-man power—a monarchy, or any arbitrary government—a government in which the people, or at least those of them competent for governing, should be the source of power and law, the form of its expression. They had just come out from under the Monarchy of England.

Mr. COCKRAN. If the gentleman will permit me, I did not discuss the corruption of the Government in regard to that. The point I made was about a trust where the parties to the trust could not scrutinize the methods of administration, and a fund which must grow, without any possibility of distribution, were both elements in conflict with the judicial system established by every State and inconsistent with the security of republican government, which had nothing to do with its growth.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me state what I understand by corruption, because your supposition involves necessarily a presumption of corruption controlling or annulling government of the people. It presumes the case of one man, or a few men, who had immense amounts of money, enough to buy everything, that the people themselves had lost their vote and their voting power because that one man or that one corporation controlled everything and voted everybody by influencing or buying the voters, or else by influencing or buying legislators, judges, or juries. That would undoubtedly be corruption, but it would be corruption under "a republican form of government." The republican governmental spirit might have departed, true enough. If there were any law that gave that man or corporation the sole power, that would not be a republican form of government; that would simply be a corrupt monarchical form of government. If you let the State of New York alone; if you leave it to itself; if you carry the government right to the door of her people and let them alone, they will root up and eradicate this evil. They won't have it long. Where you carry responsibility you give experience, and where experience is gained you find ability, and with both you have watchfulness, and with watchfulness virtue, courage, and honesty. That has always been the case. [Loud applause.]

I have forgotten who it was, perhaps it was Lord Macaulay, who said you can not teach your child how to walk by never allowing it to walk; you can not teach it to walk by always making it crawl; and you can not teach a State government fully how to grapple with vice and fraud and cunning greed unless you allow it to exercise the power of attacking and fighting them. They have got it now. Do not deceive them into the belief that the Federal Government alone has it or even concurrently has it. I wish to God they were untrammeled by Federal power to attack and uproot all these trusts. In regard to all these trusts, would that we could let the States at them. If you could let the State at the trusts they would not long exist. What protects the trusts is the shield of the interstate clause of the Federal Constitution and consequent judicial injunction. They would not have undertaken to do the things they do if it were not for the fact they are protected by the existence of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. [Loud applause.] There would not be one now in Texas, in Arkansas, in Mississippi but for the constitutional inhibition on the action of the State. I thank God that there is no constitutional power now in the Federal Government dealing with insurance iniquities, because if there were I know the iniquities would last forever. [Renewed applause.]

Let the State governments loose at insurance officials; let Jerome begin a prosecution against them in New York and put them in the penitentiary. I believe he will do it. I know he can do it. He could put them in the penitentiary for a malversation of trust funds, or embezzlement of what did not belong to them. The single act of contributing $50,000 to the Republican campaign fund, not of their own money, but money of the widows and orphans, the trustees for whom they act, would lay them liable to criminal indictment and send them to the penitentiary in most States, and I suppose would in the State of New York. I will tell you what is the matter. It is not law. It is public opinion, commercialized and pregnant with condonation of the crimes of "high finance." If Tom Jones is a corrupt State examiner, he would still be a corrupt Federal examiner; and if Tom Jones is an incorruptible man as a Federal examiner he would still be an honest man as a State examiner.

The nearer Tom Jones is to the people the nearer their knowledge of him, whether he be honest or dishonest, bought or unbought. The more indirect their control of his getting in or toppling out the more apt is he to surrender to the temptations of those ever ready to offer temptation.

As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] said yesterday, and he said it well, law does not make an honest man; God makes honest men. And when you take it in the broad and the proper sense it is true. Heredity and environment, the instrumentalities through which God works, do make honest men. You have got to have the right environment. Public opinion in administrative and financial circles is his environment; and the trouble is with public opinion itself. The trouble is with the American people. Down at the bottom of our hearts, God help us. nearly all of us somewhat respect and envy a fellow who has "financed" a half million dollars. We are like Thackeray's snob was about the nobility when he exclaimed, "I dearly love a lord." The poor devil to whom the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] referred, or some poor darky in striped clothes who had stolen over $25 worth of something to eat and been condemned to the penitentiary, you shrink from as he passes you in his convict suit, drawing your skirt aside because you do not want him to touch the hem of your garment; and yet if you are invited to-day—the membership of this House, and I take this House because it is the average of the American people, not a bit worse and perhaps a little bit better—if every Member of this House to-night should receive an invitation to dine with McCurdy or with McCall nine-tenths of you would cynically say: "Is the wine good? Does he roast his ducks well?" And you would go, the most of you. A great power of social regeneration and moral regeneration in the world, one which your ancestors always exercised, you do not exercise these days. Social ostracism is that power. That is the refusal to associate with men who are not honest. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did the gentleman from Mississippi introduce a resolution——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did the gentleman from Mississippi introduce a resolution in the last Congress calling on the Attorney-General to prosecute the defendants in the merger case, all of whom were millionaires?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and also the anthracite-coal barons, who were in partnership with the railroads, contrary to the laws of Pennsylvania and of the United States.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Were any of them indicted?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not heard of it if they were. Now, to go ahead, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SIMS. Is it any more immoral for the president of a corporation to contribute to funds for political purposes than it is for the campaign committee that solicits those funds to receive them?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, it is; because morals are a matter of how people feel—it is a subjective question to a large extent. When a man goes and solicits a campaign contribution it is on a slightly different plane. Theoretically and technically there is no difference, but practically, of course, you and I know that there is a difference. But I say this: If I was a guardian to-day of three or four helpless children, holding in trust for them a sacred fund which I was instructed by their father to hold together until a certain time and then distribute, with its accumulation, and if I were to take $10,000 out of that fund and give it to the Democratic State or national committee, there could not be found eighteen men on a grand jury, there could not be found twelve men upon a petit jury, who would not say that I was a thief, and they would render a right verdict. [Applause.] Why, the man who solicited the money may not have known whence it was coming. I would not have asked Mr. McCall for a contribution to the Democratic fund, but if I had done it and Mr. McCall had given it to me, I would have taken it for granted not that he was stealing it, but that it was his own money.

Mr. SIMS. Does not that presuppose that the national committees who solicit the funds from those officers imagine that they were getting these large contributions from them as individuals, and is that a supposable case?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know, because I suppose they may have gotten at some time or another a larger contribution from some individual who was giving his own money. I know that in past times I have heard that one great Republican, now dead, gave to the Republican campaign fund a sum larger than $50,000, and these people might have thought that this was being given in that way.

Mr. SIMS. Is it not a remarkable coincidence——

Mr. WILLIAMS. McCall was exceedingly wealthy; McCurdy was exceedingly wealthy, or supposed to be, and, besides that, all of his nephews, his cousins, and his aunts, and all the balance of the family, were drawing immense salaries from his company, and it may have been supposed that these were individual contributions. Anyhow, I do not want to inject that. I only want to go as far as I can go upon a certainty of facts. Mr. McCall knew it was not his money; Mr. McCurdy knew it was not his money, no matter who else did or did not know it. He knew he was taking money from a trust fund. He knew he was doing an act no higher and no more moral than mine would be if I had put my hands into a safe and taken out the money belonging to a sacred trust fund placed in my hands by a father to be kept together for his children. They knew they were taking and giving away that which was not theirs, but mine and yours and our children's. And that is not all. They knew when they put their hands into this fund for the purpose of pensioning all their cousins and brothers and brothers-in-law and nephews that they were doing what they ought not to have done. They may not have been stealing. It was not that; but it was the abuse of a trust, a misappropriation of a fund; and there is some remedy for that, too, somewhere in the world. There is under the Mississippi statute and there must be in New York.

Now, my friends, I decline to believe that the people of New York are corrupt. My friend from New York asked the gentleman from Kentucky if the present jurisdiction has led to the present results, what right did he have to expect any improvement. That was the substance of his question. The answer seemed to me perfectly simple. Every great piece of remedial legislation that ever existed in the world has come about after the revelation of some great abuse. It is one of God's laws that abuses breed remedies. Why, every remedy that has ever come in the physician's practice even, comes about generally after some great trouble with some great disease—trouble directing the attention of all the doctors in the world to that particular question. The great smallpox epidemics on the continent of Europe led to the discovery first of inoculation and afterwards to vaccination. The annual recurrences of yellow fever at Habana, and its danger to us when we went down to take possession, directed the intelligence of scientific men to that particular question, and led to the discovery of the fact that the mosquito was the sole cause of yellow fever epidemic, if not the sole cause of yellow fever itself. And so when you discover a great abuse like this, and when, incidentally, you discover it running all through what they call "high finance," then you awaken every man of intelligence to discern and every man of honesty to execute to the observation and consideration of that particular question and to the attempt to find a cure for it. You will not find anything like that in the State of Mississippi, because ours is a home government of a plain people, leading not a strenuous but a simple life. The environment is different.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks that when a man receives a check drawn upon the funds of the insurance company he ought not to know that it is the insurance company's funds?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; he may not know it always, because the man signing the check may have money on deposit with the insurance company. I do not want to go into that. I only want to go as far as we can without any possible fear of contradiction.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I understood the gentleman from Mississippi to state that the only medium of protection now existing between the law officers of the various States of the Union and the American people and trusts was the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. Will the gentleman not admit that embezzlement and conspiracy——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not say that that was the only one. I said that with that out of the way we could get rid of them. There are two others, railroad rebates and the tariff law.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. You are not discussing those now. The gentleman will admit that embezzlement and conspiracy are both common law and statutory offenses. The punishment of both lies with the courts of original jurisdiction in the city and county of New York. All the courts of original jurisdiction in that city and county, I believe, are under the control of the party which the gentleman from Mississippi so ably represents on the floor of this House. I ask the gentleman if that is true?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will let me finish my question—if that is true, what power is there in existence in New York or elsewhere to prevent the courts of that county from punishing the very crimes which the gentleman mentions?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing to prevent it, and they are going to be punished. The State examiners in New York, who for years refused to report this iniquitous state of affairs, were Republicans. Mr. Jerome, who can prosecute, is an independent. He is an honest man and will prosecute. If Jim Osborne had been elected he too, an honest man, would have prosecuted. Oh, what a fall there is, my countrymen, from the discussion of a great, broad, public question to a partisan fling in the shape of a question like this, to which I might make return in kind if I wished to. I believe the gentleman is from Pennsylvania. Is he also from the city of Philadelphia?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I hope that the gentleman from Mississippi is not under the impression that exists in some places in Pennsylvania, that the Commonwealth is composed exclusively of the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; the gentleman from Mississippi is not, but the gentleman from Mississippi is under the impression that prevails in many parts of this country that the absolute Republicanism of the State of Pennsylvania has been very largely due to the sardine-packed condition of things in the city of Philadelphia [laughter]; and when the gentleman stoops from the great dignity of this debate to ask whether I am a member of the party which will fail in New York City, in his opinion, to prosecute, and which did not, by the way, elect its district attorney this last time—when the gentleman stoops to that I have a perfect right to ask him if he is not from the same State and of the same party of the notorious Philadelphia stenches now in the nostrils of all men, that have surpassed in gravity of odor anything in the history of Boss Tweed, or anybody else that ever wore the uniform or bore the name of Democrat in New York City, so that these old characters are all farthing rushlights of corruption when contrasted with the great sun of the recent reeking rottenness of Republican Philadelphia. [Applause and laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been betrayed out of the line of my argument, and to get back to it would be of itself a diversion, so I believe I shall thank the House for its attention and sit down. [Applause and laughter.] I reserve the balance of my time.

Several MEMBERS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested that the committee rise at this time and that we adjourn until to-morrow. I have no objection to that, reserving my right to the floor.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House resolution 42 and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, for five days, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend in the RECORD some remarks which I made this afternoon on the subject of insurance, while in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

He also introduced a bill (S. 1943) to correct the military record of Edward R. Vanderslice; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 1944) granting an increase of pension to Frederick O. Graffam; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1945) granting an increase of pension to Gideon F. Pond; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DOLLIVER introduced a bill (S. 1946) to amend the military record of Ephriam P. Evans; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 1947) granting an increase of pension to Samuel S. Snyder;

A bill (S. 1948) granting an increase of pension to William J. Conrad;

A bill (S. 1949) granting a pension to Edward T. White; and

A bill (S. 1950) granting an increase of pension to Ransom L. Harris (with an accompanying paper).

Mr. LONG introduced a bill (S. 1951) to correct the military record of Talton T. Davis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TALIAFERRO introduced a bill (S. 1952) granting an increase of pension to Jesse Alderman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

CHARLES L. EATON AND OTHERS.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Charles L. Eaton, Alonzo B. Eaton, and Edward H. Eaton, only children of Alonzo J. Eaton, late a member of the Capitol police force, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his demise, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 15th instant, approved and signed:

S. 410. An act to authorize the Rock Island, Arkansas and Louisiana Railroad Company to construct bridges across Ouachita River and other navigable rivers in the State of Arkansas.

TRANSPORTATION OF COAL AND MINE SUPPLIES.

Mr. TILLMAN. I send to the desk a resolution calling for certain information, for which I ask immediate consideration. It will not cause any debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be directed to send to the Senate the records and testimony and opinion of the Commission in the matter of alleged unlawful rates and practices in the transportation of coal and mine supplies by the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company, decided February 1, 1905.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Thursday, December 21, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian, Thursday, January 4, 1906.

GREAT NORTHWESTERN TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a report by the Secretary of State, submitting a claim of the Great Northwestern Telegraph Company, of Canada, on account of losses sustained through the fouling of their telegraph cable by the U. S. S. Essex on July 17, 1905.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 16, 1905.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 299) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River by the Portland and Seattle Railway Company; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

PANAMA CANAL APPROPRIATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 480.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 480) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, and making appropriation for isthmian canal construction, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

Mr. BACON. I ask that the Secretary may read the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill the following as a new section:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury, within ninety days from the passage of this act, and thereafter at the beginning of each regular session, shall submit to Congress estimates in detail covering all salaries and compensation for all persons, except laborers, employed in the construction of the Panama Canal, or in connection with the same, by the Isthmian Canal Commission, including all officers and officials of said Commission.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it will be noted that my amendment requires these estimates to be submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury. That is, as I understand, in accordance with the general law, which requires that all estimates for expenditures, for whatever Department they may be, shall come from the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress.

I do not intend, Mr. President, to detain the Senate with any extended remarks upon this subject, but it does strike me that this is a most important matter. As the law now stands there is no requirement for the submission of estimates in such detail as would enable the Congress to deal with the question as to whether any particular salary is or is not exorbitant. In other words, the estimates can be made in a more general way and still comply with the present requirement of law; and if they are made in the general way in which they were submitted during the progress of this bill in either House, and after the measure was under consideration, the opportunity is entirely lost to the House of Representatives or the Senate to properly scrutinize the question of the propriety of the allowance for salaries made in any particular case or in regard to any particular class of officers.

Now, Mr. President, that is more necessary in the case of the appropriations for the canal than it is for appropriations for any of the regular branches of the Government, for the reason that in the regular Departments of the Government the officers to be compensated are specified by the law, and being thus specified by the law it is entirely competent and practicable for Congress to fix what shall be the salary of each officer. But it is impracticable to specify in advance all the officers who shall be employed in this gigantic work with all its varied details and changing conditions and developments. That must be left largely to the discretion of executive and administrative officers. Therefore it is necessary that some method should be adopted by which Congress may still keep its hand upon the important matter of determining whether allowances for salaries are exorbitant or whether they are of proper proportion.

That can only be done, I repeat, when the question of appropriations comes up. The estimates are then made for so many Commissioners, so many officers in the engineering department, and so on; and then it is perfectly practicable for Congress in making the appropriations upon these estimates to fix the amounts which are to be paid.

I do not suppose that it is the intention of Congress to be extra critical upon the subject, because much must necessarily be left to the discretion of those who are on the ground and by whom the conditions are probably better known and more accurately appreciated than they can be by those of us at this distance. But it is not only proper, but I will say necessary, that there should be the opportunity for Congress to correct anything in the matter of expenditures which is exorbitant.

The necessity for that, I think, is clearly disclosed by the salaries which are being paid now—many of them, not all of them. I have not the list before me. I am sorry I have not. If any Senator has it I wish he would let me have it. Speaking generally, I may be in error, but I think that the general scale of compensation, not with exactitude, but approximately——

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator means the list used in the debates in the House?

Mr. BACON. The one that gives the salaries of the officials.

Mr. TILLMAN. Here it is. [The paper was handed.]

Mr. BACON. I was saying that I think the general scale of compensation which the Government observes in the payment of its civil officers, while not exactly followed, should be largely a guide to those who have the fixing of salaries in this important work.

Now, what is a fact with reference to the salaries which have already been fixed and which are now being paid? We have, in the beginning, the man who is put at the head of the Commission with a salary which, outside of ambassadors to foreign countries, is twice as large as that of any civil officer of the United States except the President of the United States. If I recollect aright, the salary of the Chief Justice of the United States is $15,000, and it has only been raised recently to that amount; it was much less than that up to a few years ago. The salary of $30,000 is paid to the head of this canal work.

As I was saying yesterday, Mr. President, I do not think that the salaries which are paid by large corporations to their officials ought to be the guide by which is to be determined the scale of salaries to be paid to these officials. I repeat what I said yesterday or the day before, that we have every reason to believe as to these corporations—and I am no man to inveigh against corporations, and my record in the Senate will show it—we have every reason to believe that the salaries paid by these corporations are largely matters of favoritism and are not measured by the proper scale of the value of those services. In my humble judgment, the man does not live whose personal services are worth $150,000 a year for any work. I mention that salary as an extreme one. I might say the same thing of a great many other exorbitant amounts which are being paid by these large corporations to their officials, very far in excess, in my humble judgment, of the value of any man's personal services in any capacity.

It is very easy to be liberal in the expenditure of the money of other people. And these particular corporations which of late have had such an amount of public advertising in this regard have been dealing with the money of other people—people of every class, scattered all over the United States—and they have squandered these trust funds to the point of criminality in heaping these vast sums upon themselves and their favorites. The immense salaries thus paid by them have been far in excess of the value of the services rendered by these favorites.

Whether that be true or not, the policy of this Government is well known. It has been settled by more than a hundred years and is shown in the salary lists of the officials of the Government of the United States. While it may not be necessary to strictly conform to it, still the general policy of the Government in the payment of moderate salaries to its officials ought to be observed as a guide in the fixing of these salaries, at least approximately.

Why, Mr. President, what is the salary paid to the auditor of the canal expenditures? I have forgotten. Some Senator here will tell me.

Mr. TILLMAN. For the Canal Commission?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Ten thousand dollars.

Mr. BACON. Ten thousand dollars is paid to the auditor, and his work comes here for supervision and correction and approval by an auditor in the War Department, an officer who gets $4,000 per annum under the Government. The auditor of the canal expenditure gets $10,000. The Secretary of War, at the head of all this business, gets $8,000; and the clerks in the auditor's department, who are ready to do the work and whose knowledge and skill and experience is that upon which the head auditors in the Departments rely in determining as to the correctness of expenditures—the clerks, more competent or fully as competent as the man in Panama to do the work, are men who get from twelve hundred to fourteen hundred dollars and sixteen hundred dollars, and in rarest of instances $2,000 a year.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. There is not any evidence that this auditor has been at Panama, or that he stays there.

Mr. BACON. That may be true, but I am stating the case in the most favorable light in which it can be stated for him and for those who allow him this exorbitant salary. I say even if he is on the Isthmus, and that is stating it as strongly as it can be stated for him. The Secretary of the Treasury, the man at the head of the great financial interests of this Government, the man to supervise all, the man to control all beneath him, gets $8,000, and, forsooth, an unknown man, the appointment not confirmed by the Senate or required to be confirmed by the Senate, is to receive more money than the head of the financial Department of the Government.

So I might go on through, Mr. President. I am not niggardly in my ideas as to salaries. I would be perfectly willing to pay the salaries which I see are paid, if I recollect correctly, to the Commissioners, $7,500. I would be perfectly willing to do that. I am quite frank to say that I think the officials of the Government are largely underpaid. When I say "largely," I mean a great many of them, using the word "largely" not as to the amount but as to the classes.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. Would the Senator fix the salary of the chief engineer, the officer who is to reside upon the Isthmus, upon whose skill and knowledge of the profession depends very much the successful——

Mr. BACON. What is it?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know what it is.

Mr. GALLINGER. Thirty thousand dollars.

Mr. BACON. The chief engineer? I certainly do think it is too high.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator would limit it?

Mr. BACON. I certainly would.

Mr. SPOONER. How would the Senator limit it?

Mr. BACON. I would not pay any official connected with that business more than is paid the Chief Justice of the United States—not one of them. That is the highest salary paid to any civil officer of the Government outside of foreign ambassadors.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me a moment, the commission feature of the canal act was, as the Senator from Georgia stated yesterday, his amendment. The original proposition, as I drew it and introduced it, contemplated the construction of the canal without the intervention of a commission. On the passage of the bill the Senator offered the amendment providing for the commission, and it was adopted. I think I voted for it.

Mr. BACON. The Senator signified his acquiescence in it before I offered it.

Mr. SPOONER. One reason why I voted for it was that the Senator's amendment left the matter of salaries within the power of the President, in order that he might be able to adjust the compensation which he could pay to engineers and others of a professional character with reference to the sum which might, in view of the competition of great corporations needing such services, be necessary to procure the men.

Now, does the Senator think that it would be in the interest of the public, that it would be wise policy, to limit the salary of the chief engineer of the canal to the salary of the Chief Justice? Upon what theory? What similarity in conditions exists between the two propositions? The railway corporations of this country make a great market for engineering talent. They bid against each other for great civil engineers. Every few days you will find a successful, scientific, and talented chief engineer leaving one corporation with which he has long been, and going to another because he will draw a better salary.

Mr. BACON. The Senator, I understood, asked me a question. He does not let me reply to it.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the President of the United States, in choosing a chief engineer to take charge of this great work, so far as the plan is concerned, and to conduct the operations, ought to be permitted to get the best talent that can be found in the United States, and to pay the necessary price to induce such a man to go there and do that work. Does not the Senator think so?

Mr. BACON. Now, will the Senator——

Mr. SPOONER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BACON. Will he please give me his question. The Senator did not state his question.

Mr. SPOONER. I asked the question in the first place.

Mr. BACON. One question at a time.

Mr. SPOONER. Then I thought I would explain the question to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I am very much obliged to the Senator. I am sure I would not have understood it otherwise.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Georgia draws an unfair inference from a joking remark.

Mr. BACON. Perhaps the Senator from Georgia rejoined in the same spirit.

Mr. SPOONER. My question is whether the Senator is sure that he would limit the salary of the chief engineer to $12,500.

Mr. BACON. I did not say that.

Mr. SPOONER. Or limit it at all?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator has accompanied his question with a considerable statement, and therefore it is necessary that I should do more than give him a categorical answer.

As to the amendment which is now found in the seventh section of the Spooner Act, the Senator correctly states what occurred with reference to that amendment. The bill as originally introduced by him and which was pending in the Senate did not contain any provision for the Commission or for any machinery by which the President should proceed with the execution of the work.

Mr. SPOONER. It was to be done under the War Department.

Mr. BACON. Yes; it simply devolved the duty upon the President, and the only limitation was that he should do it through the War Department. I became satisfied, Mr. President, that machinery would be required, and I thought it was better that machinery should be prescribed by Congress and have somewhat of a legal status and something permanent in its nature rather than that the machinery should be left to the construction entirely of the Executive Department, with the liability to constant changes.

I drafted the amendment, and having every confidence in the judgment of my distinguished friend, the author of the bill, I submitted it to him before I introduced it. If he will remember, the amendment as originally drawn by me contained specifications as to the salaries of the Commission.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. So I am not taking any position now which I did not originally occupy. Upon the suggestion of the Senator, however, that that should be left open, I yielded to his judgment in the matter for two reasons. In the first place, as it was his measure and one the success of which would redound to his honor and his credit and the want of success of which would be to his disadvantage, I felt it was due to him that in putting an amendment upon the bill which should contain this somewhat radical change there should be such provisions as would meet with his approval. That was one reason. The other reason, possibly a more practical one, was that I did not think in the face of his opposition I could secure the adoption of my amendment.

For those two reasons, Mr. President, the amendment was changed to conform to the view of the Senator from Wisconsin, the number of commissioners and their character simply being prescribed, and the right to fix their salaries being left to the President of the United States.

Then the amendment further provided, and it is now a part of the law, that the Commissioners should appoint all the subordinate officers, subject to the approval of the President, which was manifestly correct. In framing the amendment, leaving the salaries unfixed, it was never in my contemplation, nor do I suppose it was in the contemplation of the learned and distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, that Congress would entirely surrender its right to determine whether the salaries fixed were proper or whether they were exorbitant.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is partly right about that. I supposed, of course, and the language of the Senator's amendment contemplated it, that the salary to be paid to the members of the Commission would later, when it could be intelligently dealt with, be fixed by Congress.

Mr. BACON. Exactly; I recollect that now.

Mr. SPOONER. I supposed, also, that the salaries of the employees of the Commission in Washington would be fixed by Congress. But if the Senator will pardon me a moment I will say that I preferred his plan, although with some misgivings as to the Commission, to my original proposition to have this work done under the War Department, for the reason that it gave to the President greater freedom in obtaining what obviously was needed and will be needed—the highest talent in various directions for utilization on the Isthmus—and I did not suppose at all that at any time, at any rate not until the plan had been adopted and the work was well along, that Congress would attempt to limit the salary or compensation to be paid to such officials as the chief engineer. You can not get the best men at a low price. Men who can make $50,000 a year in the employ of great corporations will not put that behind them. They will feel that they can not in justice to their families and to themselves work for the Government in the Tropics at $12,000 a year. This very elasticity of the Senator's amendment, so far as it applied to the men who were to be employed on the Isthmus, was what commended it to me as very much superior to the proposition which I had made, that the work be done under the War Department, where the salaries would be fixed and the President would be tied down by the limited number of people whom he could select for the work of the engineering department, and so forth.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I had not finished my reply to the interrogatory of the learned Senator, and, while I am always delighted to hear from him, I will resume where I left off.

I desire to say that so far as this question is concerned I regard the question of the payment of salaries, which some may think to be exorbitant to the higher officials, as the least important one in the question of exorbitant salaries. I repeat what I said, that I think any officer connected with this gigantic work ought not to be paid higher than the amount of the salary of the Chief Justice. While I repeat that, I say in this connection that I regard that as the least important one in regard to the matter of salaries, because there are only one or two of them, and they stand out clear and distinct from the others; and there may be reasons such as those which have been so forcefully presented by the learned Senator from Wisconsin, which will obtain in their case which do not apply to others.

I think nevertheless, Mr. President, that the question of the salary of the chief officer in charge and of the chief engineer is influenced very largely by the same considerations which influenced the learned Senator from Wisconsin to accept a salary of $5,000, when he can make ten times as much at the bar. It is because it is an honor to him to sit in this body which, if you please, he also honors by serving as one of its members. So it is an honor to these men to stand before the world as worthy to be in charge of the execution of such a work, the accomplishment of which is to be for them through all the ages an imperishable monument.

It is not merely a matter of dollars and cents. It may be said that is not a correct argument, that that is not a legitimate argument, but it is the argument upon which the Government proceeds when it fixes the salary of the learned Senator from Wisconsin; when it fixes the salary of the Chief Justice of the United States; when it fixes the salary of the Cabinet officer, and even that of the President of the United States. Why, Mr. President, should we abandon it in this important work, and why should we make an exception to it?

I repeat, I do not desire that it should be held down to exact figures or that we should be niggardly; but as to these chief officers there is something else besides the mere matter of money. It is a matter of imperishable fame and honor to the man who is the chairman of that Commission if he shall be retained, if he can go through in the successful prosecution and ending of this work; and it is a matter of only less fame and honor imperishable in its character to the engineer who, under his chief officer, shall successfully prosecute that work to a favorable termination. It is not simply a question of the money he is receiving. He is not simply getting compensation in money, but he is getting it in that which is worth more than money to every man of honorable and exalted ambition.

Do you say the Government seeks to get services for less than they are worth on the ground that the honor of such services is compensation? My only answer is that is what the Government does year after year. It does it as to the other departments, and this work is equivalent to a department of the Government, and it ought to be governed in a large measure by the same considerations.

But, sir, I repeat I will not stickle on the question of the compensation for the chief officer or for the chief engineer. I yield on that if it is necessary, although I abate in no particular the view I have to-day expressed. But the alarming thing with which we are confronted is the fact that the most exorbitant salaries have been paid and provided for for men of only such capacity that there are hundreds and thousands of others of equal capacity whose services can be had. That is the point. We have one—I do not know the gentleman, and I do not desire to do him an injustice—we have one of them right here in this town to whom we pay $10,000 a year for a very indefinite kind of work that he is to do and has done in the capacity of a press agent.

But leaving that out as an exceptional case, if you please, we come down to the more important matter of compensation of this army of officers—because there must be an army of them—all upon a scale absolutely disproportioned to the payments made by this Government to other officers performing the same character of services and services of greater responsibility, because while these canal officers have only a subordinate responsibility, their work is supervised by these Government officers in Washington for approval or for condemnation—in the simple fact that the man who holds a subordinate position gets $10,000, while the auditor, who is to supervise his work, gets but $4,000, and so on in proportion. I only mention that because that is right at hand and within touch; but you may go through the scale, and it is the same way. I have no doubt that it is true, although I have not the figures before me, that the subordinate officers of the auditor of the canal work receive just as great a disproportion in salaries paid to the subordinate officers of the auditors here as the auditor of the canal work receives in proportion to the salary paid to the auditor here.

The statement is perfectly monstrous that an officer who is not only subordinate, but doubly subordinate, should get 250 per cent more than the Government officer who supervises him and 25 per cent more of salary than the head of the Treasury Department of the United States or of the War Department, each of which has to deal directly or indirectly with this work.

Mr. President, it is not simply a matter of squandering the public treasure. When I say "squandering" I do not mean any offense to those gentlemen who have fixed these salaries, because I have said twice, and I will say a third time, that I do not attribute any improper motive to those who have fixed these salaries, and therefore I will modify the word which sounds harshly and say "improvidently spending the public money." I think it was an error of judgment upon their part, a difference of judgment between them and ourselves; but, Mr. President, I venture the suggestion that there is not a Senator in this Chamber who will rise in his place and say that he thinks these salaries are proper and should be continued. If there is one, I pause to give him an opportunity to say it. [A pause.] Well, Mr. President, nobody answers. When in this body, clothed with our high trust to see that the public money is properly expended, no man arises in his place and says that he thinks these expenditures are just and proper, is it true we are to pass the matter over without taking some measures to correct it?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not propose to say, in response to the Senator's interrogatory, that in my opinion all those salaries are proper, because I am not clear on that point; in fact, I am inclined to agree with the Senator that some of them are unreasonable; but I think if the Senator will read the testimony of Secretary Taft, on pages 54 and 55 of the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations in reference to the purchasing agent and the auditor, he will find that there were very good reasons for employing men that ought to be paid a much larger salary than an auditor in the War Department should be paid. Secretary Taft goes on to show that it is impossible to get an audit in one of these Departments in less than six months; and he ought to know, being at the head of one of the Departments. The Canal Commission desired to have their accounts audited up to date. He also states that, after investigating the matter, he found that he could not get a man who could do that work satisfactorily for less than the amount of money that is being paid.

After the Senator is through I will put in the RECORD precisely what Secretary Taft said about all these large salaries.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me a moment further, in the matter of the chief engineer, Secretary Taft shows that Mr. Wallace, although he received a salary of $25,000 a year, resigned, and Mr. Stevens, who was selected to succeed Mr. Wallace, refused to go to the Isthmus for less than $30,000 a year. Possibly they could have found some other engineer who would have gone for a less amount, but the Commission thought in their wisdom that Mr. Stevens was the best equipped man, and they selected him at that salary.

Then, again, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me a moment further, the Senator makes a comparison between the salaries paid the Secretary of War and these officers. The Congress of the United States fixed the salary of the Secretary of War and the Chief Justice of the United States. May we not have fixed those salaries too low? Is it not a fact that the heads of these Departments ought to receive more than $8,000 a year if we dealt with them as justly as we ought to do?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I repeat what I said in an earlier stage of my remarks, that I think many of the salaries paid by the United States Government are on too low a scale; but I will say that is the policy of the Government; and if it is the policy of the Government in one Department, there is no reason why there should be an exception in this case.

Mr. President, I do not believe that there is any scarcity of competent men in the United States to do this work, as I have suggested, but I repeat that the payment of the two principal officers is a minor consideration to me, because I am more concerned about the subordinate positions. There is where I say the evil is shown.

But before I pass from the subject suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I desire to say this: At the time the Spooner Act was passed we already had a Canal Commission. It was presided over by a naval officer. When this amendment was drawn there was not only a permission, but a requirement that both Army and Navy officers should be upon this Commission. I am very frank to say that I think it was not only my contemplation, but the contemplation of other Senators, that possibly it might be continued in the future as it had been in the past, and that the Commission would be presided over by an Army officer or by a naval officer; but no requirement was made in that regard. I am confident, however, of the fact—I will say that I will not permit myself to doubt the fact—that there are engineering officers in the Army of the United States fully competent to occupy the position of chief of this Commission; but whether or not a naval officer is equally competent, by reason of the different character of his work upon the sea, I am not prepared to say. It may be that a naval officer would be equally competent for the chief position as chairman of this Commission. I am equally confident that there are engineering officers in the Army of the United States who are fully competent to occupy the position of chief engineer of the canal.

Mr. President, it was intended by this law that the Army officers and the Navy officers, when they were appointed upon this Commission, should not be limited to their regular salaries. It was intended that they should have just as much as civil officers should have in similar positions. But while that is true, it was never the intention or the contemplation, so far as I know, of the Senate that the salaries should be exorbitant, whether enjoyed by military and naval men or by civilians.

But I am constantly brought back to the proposition that the thing which presses upon me is not so much the compensation of these higher officers, for there are very few of them, but the scale of compensation for men in subordinate capacities.

I was saying, Mr. President, when I was interrupted by one of the learned Senators, that it is not simply a question of dollars and cents. It is more than a question merely of money. In my humble judgment there is nothing which has done more to debauch the public conscience and to demoralize the young men of this land—and not only the young men, but some of the older men, also—than the knowledge of the fact ever present before them that while they have to dig and delve and toil for a pittance there are other men who do not do half the work they do who are enjoying each year what would be to them a princely fortune for all life. Therefore we have these irregularities, these defaultings, these efforts to get rich by gambling of one kind or another to acquire quickly large wealth.

Sir, these depraving and debauching influences are destructive of the high ideals and beneficent designs upon which our Government was founded. This was a Government in its inception designed for the happiness and peace and content of a simple and a frugal people. It was not designed for the aggrandizement of officials, much less was it designed for the enrichment of officials; and in the scale of compensation of its officers the door was shut in the faces of those who would seek public preferment in high places with no higher motive than to gain money thereby. And these same exalted considerations should not be entirely ignored in fixing the salaries of these higher canal officials, upon whom a great and an honorable public trust is devolved, and who are to win imperishable fame and honor if they succeed in their great undertaking. And as to the officers of less rank their salaries ought to be measured, approximately, at least, by the scale of salaries that the Government pays to its officials of corresponding grade and responsibility. If conditions in that tropical climate make it proper to do so, then let the salaries of such officials be higher by a certain per cent than corresponding salaries of Government officials at home, as is done in the case of officers serving in the Philippines. But let not these differences in conditions cause all considerations of economy to be thrown to the winds.

Sir, we have no control over the question as to what salaries some profligate corporations shall pay to their officers, except so far as the authority having jurisdiction shall see that certain things which trench upon the domain of dishonesty are not permitted to pass with impunity. Nevertheless their example is debauching and demoralizing upon the public in witnessing the riotous prodigality with which unearned luxury and wealth is lavished upon their favorites. And, sir, it does not become us to follow in the same track, and it does not become us, when we have entered upon a great physical and material enterprise, to be establishing a scale of salaries for its officials which shall have a demoralizing and debauching influence upon the young men of this country when they contemplate the pitiful amounts they receive for their labor in comparison to what these men enjoy.

Mr. President, we are at the beginning of this great work. It has to continue for years—how many years we do not know—and right in the inception of it, right at the first stages of it, we are met with these startling facts. Now, imputing no improper design to anybody, what has been developed shows to us the absolute necessity that Congress shall lay its hands upon this matter.

It is the contemplation of our Government that all expenditures shall be only such as are authorized by the Congress, and whenever you fix it so that the executive department has no check upon the amount which it can undertake to pay and which it can contract to pay you at once surrender the purse to the Executive. Therefore, while we must of necessity in this case leave the matter largely to the Executive, at the same time it is our duty, so far as we can practically do so, to arrange the progress of this work in a manner that Congress shall keep its hands upon the question of expenditure and shall determine what shall be the scale of wages, of salaries, and of other disbursements.

The amendment, Mr. President, which I have introduced has been suggested to me by what fell from the lips of the learned Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] two days ago as to the propriety of estimates being made and submitted to Congress at the beginning of each session showing what officers are to be employed and what amounts of money are estimated to be required for their compensation. I said then that the suggestion of the Senator from Maine was an eminently practical one and that unless the amendment was introduced by some other Senator I would introduce it myself.

There is in this bill language under which the Secretary of the Treasury would be authorized to make that which this amendment more specifically requires, but it is not necessary under the language of the bill, as I construe it, that he should do so. He might do so and he might not do so; in other words, the estimates might be such as they are at this time. I will read the language of the bill as it stands:

> The President shall annually cause to be made—

I am reading from the third page of the bill, section 2—

> The President shall annually cause to be made, by the persons appointed and employed by him in charge of the government of said Canal Zone and the construction of said canal, estimates of expenditures and appropriations, in detail as far as practicable.

That, I say, is language under which the estimates might be made with the particularity which we require or they might not be; and it is for the purpose of setting it at rest and, furthermore, of putting these estimates upon the same ground that other estimates are put, which the law requires shall come through the Secretary of the Treasury, that this amendment is offered.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. HALE. I think the intention is to cover everything; but, as the Senator says, it might not be so construed. Suppose that in line 14, after the word "estimates," we should insert "shall cover all salaries and compensation paid to persons employed in this work, excepting laborers, and such estimates" shall be submitted to Congress, etc.

That, I think, is substantially the language of detail in the Senator's amendment—"which estimates shall cover all salaries and compensation paid to persons employed in this work, excepting laborers."

Mr. BACON. The suggestion of the Senator from Maine thoroughly accomplishes what this amendment proposes to accomplish in every respect, except one. The concluding language, as I understand it, in lines 16 to 19, refers to the provisions of the law which requires these estimates to come through the Secretary of the Treasury. Am I correct in that?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly; all do come through him.

Mr. BACON. That is what that refers to?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. BACON. So that that provision of the amendment is also met; but there is one other provision which is not met, and that is this: The Senator will observe that the requirement of the language which he just read is for a report and estimate annually. That also might be covered by the subsequent provision that it should be in accordance with the act of June 30, 1902.

Mr. HALE. The fundamental act declares that these estimates shall be sent in to Congress at a certain time before each regular session.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. HALE. That is covered.

Mr. BACON. I am simply sifting this out and coming down to the point. There is still one other provision in the amendment which would not be met by the amendment suggested by the Senator from Maine, and that is the one which requires that in this year there shall be an estimate made within ninety days from this time. The reason for that requirement is that we have already been put upon notice that within ninety days we are to have another deficiency bill, when this very question is to come up again; and the purpose of the ninety-day provision is to put us in a position where, when that bill comes up before us, we will have the information necessary for us to deal with it, information which it was confessed in the other House and admitted in this House we have not.

Of course I recognize the fact, Mr. President, that in the emergency it is our duty to go forward and make this appropriation without waiting for that information, because the work of the canal requires that the appropriation should be made at once. Therefore I recognize the propriety of pretermitting this question of salaries, so far as this bill is concerned, because of the impossibility of dealing with it. I would not pretermit one or two items, in regard to which the information is within our possesson. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] ought to be adopted as to any other salary we may appear competent to deal with; but it is manifestly impossible for us now to take up this subject and properly scrutinize all these thousands of salaries and fix them without delaying beyond the proper time the appropriation, which the immediate, prompt progress of the work requires. Therefore, I say, with possibly these two or three exceptions, we should pretermit the question of salaries and go on and make this appropriation.

I have stated to the Senator from Maine the reason why I think the amendment suggested had possibly better stand, but, of course, I would yield to the superior wisdom and judgment of the gentlemen in charge of the appropriation bill if they seriously object to this amendment and prefer that there should be that interlineation as suggested by the Senator from Maine. But I think the importance of it and the necessity that we should have this information within ninety days, and not simply at the beginning of the next session or at the beginning of the fiscal year, would justify that there should be this separate amendment. However, I will yield to whatever the gentlemen in charge of the appropriation bill may say so long as there is accomplished substantially the purpose of the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I think there is no dissent from the opinion suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] as to the importance of having annual detailed estimates of proposed expenditures, but if the Senator will carefully examine the text of the bill as it came to us from the House, I think he will be satisfied that the provisions in the bill are amply sufficient to cover his desire as respects this question. I think the House provision, which was left in the bill by the Senate committee, is ample, and, I think, more effective than the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia. Now, I wish to read the provision as it stands in the bill:

> The President shall annually cause to be made—

This is directed to the President because he is the responsible person in charge of the construction of the Panama Canal—

> The President shall annually cause to be made, by the persons appointed and employed by him in charge of the government of said Canal Zone and the construction of said canal, estimates of expenditures and appropriations, in detail as far as practicable, which estimates shall be submitted to Congress in the manner provided in section 5 of the act entitled "An act making appropriation for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for other purposes."

That requires the President to cause to be made, as far as practicable, a detailed estimate of every expenditure, in accordance with the fifth section of the act of 1902. I wish to read the fifth section:

> SEC. 5. That hereafter it shall be the duty of the heads of the several Executive Departments, and of other officers authorized or required to make estimates, to furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury, on or before the 15th day of October of each year, their annual estimates for the public service, to be included in the Book of Estimates prepared by law under his direction, and in case of failure to furnish estimates as herein required it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be prepared in the Treasury Department, on or before the 1st day of November of each year, estimates for such appropriations as in his judgment shall be requisite in every such case, which estimates shall be included in the Book of Estimates prepared by law under his direction for the consideration of Congress.

This provision requires the President to cause to be submitted annually estimates under this clause. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall, within ninety days, make such estimates. I submit to the Senator from Georgia that it is impossible for the Secretary of the Treasury, under his phraseology, to make the estimates as proposed. It is the duty primarily of those having these expenditures in charge to make the estimates, and this bill provides that the President shall do it. So, under the existing law, and under the provisions in the pending bill, these estimates must be made in absolute detail, not only with respect to salaries, but with respect to every other item that is practicable.

The Senator criticises the words "as far as practicable," and has fear that the President, in the execution of this provision, will not estimate for the salaries. That is the easiest and the most practicable thing for the President to do in connection with this matter; and is it required of us that we shall go beyond the provisions that are here and specify a particular salary or particular salaries in order to get this information and secure the estimates under the provisions of the fifth section of the law? So, Mr. President, as I understand, this provision is ample to accomplish every purpose that the Senator from Georgia, and the Senate as well, have in mind.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ALLISON. I yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to ask the Senator if he understands the language of the bill which we are considering to mean that before we appropriate regularly for the next fiscal year for the construction of the canal we shall have the estimates of which he speaks? The language employed there is "annually," and under it I imagine the President, if he were indifferent, might defer the estimates until the next session of Congress. We have already met, and have had this measure brought in as an emergency appropriation, but I now have reference to the regular appropriation which will come in later, as I understand the Senator, either from the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, if the Senate shall give it to that body, or on the sundry civil bill; and I wish to know from him now whether or not he expects to get any estimate for the coming year.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly, Mr. President. These estimates are not included thus far in the Book of Estimates. They were not included because they were not fully prepared under the conditions that surround the construction of the canal, but appropriations must be made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and in order that they shall be made under the provisions of the fifth section, estimates therefor must be made to the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. TILLMAN. Immediately or as soon as practicable; certainly before we pass the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Immediately, I should say.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is all I want.

Mr. ALLISON. Within a very few weeks or months.

Of course the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, if it has any power at all, is a limitation, it seems to me, upon the law as proposed by the provisions of the pending bill. It says there shall be an estimate within ninety days, but that is wholly unnecessary, because there may be an estimate within ninety days for the additional deficiency of the current year, as appears from the testimony of the Secretary of War. Surely there will be an estimate—whether we make it imperative or not—for the next fiscal year. That will come in as soon as it is possible to prepare it.

So, Mr. President, while sympathizing with the Senator from Georgia in everything he suggests, and believing that it is necessary for Congress to have these detailed estimates, I think they are amply provided for in the bill as it stands, and I regard the amendment proposed, except that part requiring the Secretary of the Treasury within ninety days to make the estimates, as rather restrictive than enlarging the present provision. Therefore, while I do not object to the suggestions made by the Senator from Georgia, I think his amendment is wholly unnecessary, and I shall be glad to have him withdraw it, as I think its purpose is clearly covered by the provisions of the bill.

Mr. President, I wish to say one word and one word only as respects the salaries to which the Senator from Georgia has alluded. I do not think the canal can be constructed on the basis suggested by the Senator from Georgia as to this higher class of service. I happen to know two men who had an opportunity, or at least it was suggested that they had an opportunity, of securing the position of chief engineer. Neither of them would accept the position because they were doing better in other employments as engineers. I think I am not mistaken when I say that this place was offered or suggested to a distinguished engineer who is now the chief engineer of the great work that is going on for the Pennsylvania Railroad in the city of New York, and though I do not know what he receives, I have no doubt he gets a larger compensation than is paid to Mr. Stevens, the chief engineer of the canal. It was said by some Senator that he absolutely refused to accept the place at a salary of less than $30,000.

I do not know how many engineers there are in this country who are fit to take charge of that great work as an engineering problem; but I do not believe there are many, and I believe that an engineer of the experience and with the qualifications of Mr. Stevens can earn for his engineering work in this country an amount equivalent to the salary he is now receiving from the Panama Canal Commission.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to interrupt the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. What is needed in the building of the canal is not an engineer; it is a man of executive ability. First, you want your engineers to determine what the canal shall be, determine all the facts connected with it, and which an engineer must necessarily determine before the work begins. Then you want a man who is accustomed to handling men. There are plenty of men in this country who are not engineers who would fill that bill. But first of all you now lack data that can only be furnished by engineers.

For the time being, at least, we must have a first-class engineer, and not only one, but several. I feel somewhat like the Senator from Georgia. I do not object to men of high talent receiving high salaries. It is the men who do work that might be done by any one of ten thousand men. There are few men who are fit to be engineers in charge of such a work. We had better pay one of them $50,000 a year than an inferior man $10,000 a year. I am not going to complain of that. If I were President, I would pick the best engineer; then I would pick his associates, and let them go to work, and then I would look around for a man who has ability to command men and organize. He will have all the facts before him. He will have his engineer with him. That is the kind of man you want for superintendent and general manager of the canal.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Colorado has said, in much better form than I could, what I was trying to say as respects the engineering work.

Mr. TELLER. I beg pardon for interrupting the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. When we enter upon the construction of the canal, it may be we can employ at a smaller salary an engineer who has not the skill and experience and genius of a great engineer, but I apprehend that even in the course of the construction of the canal very great and new engineering questions will arise as to the disposition of water, the construction of dams, and all the intricate problems that are involved in its construction.

And the Senator from Colorado is exactly right when he says what we want is a high-class man, familiar with construction work, in giving direction to it in a business way. I undertake to say that that was just what the President had in mind when he employed Mr. Shonts as director of the canal.

Mr. GALLINGER. He is not an engineer.

Mr. ALLISON. He is not an engineer, but he has had large experience.

Mr. GALLINGER. In business matters.

Mr. ALLISON. In business matters, and particularly in construction work. He knows how to handle men and how to dispose of the questions that arise in connection with the employment of men. I believe that Mr. Shonts is eminently qualified for that work, both from the experience and the opportunities he has had in similar work. It is easy for us to criticise the salaries of these two gentlemen, who receive large sums, I admit, but they are engaged in a very important work, each in a separate and distinct branch of it.

Now, as to salaries, I said the other day, and I believe, that as to the salaries of the people who are employed here and only here in the departmental work of the Commission, they should not be paid as large salaries as some of them are being paid now. I have no doubt that, attention being called to it, the matter will be disposed of very soon in a manner satisfactory to Congress.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. ALLISON. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask a question for information. I have been glancing over the report of the expenses paid by the Commission. I do not find such a division of expenditures as will enable me to ascertain just what I wish to know.

There are practically three items of expense—salaries, the purchase of material, and labor. Can the Senator inform me approximately what proportion of the expenses so far incurred is for salaries, what proportion is for material, and what proportion has been paid for what we understand to be common labor? In these reports the labor seems to be included in the salaries, but a glance at the whole thing upon the face of it would indicate that there are about $3 paid for salaries where there is a dollar paid for actual labor; and if that is true, it seems to me about three-fourths of the expenses paid for constructing the canal will be for salaries rather than for the actual labor in digging the ditch.

I appreciate the fact that the large expenses for material as indicated in this report are for such material as can be used in the entire period of the construction of the canal, but there does seem, upon the face of it, to be a great disparity between the enormous amount for salaries and what would seem to indicate the amount paid for labor.

Mr. ALLISON. There is in the testimony a statement subdividing the expenditures, perhaps not quite in as much detail as the Senator would desire. But as to salaries, there is an estimate in the testimony on page 10 which shows the salaries of the Commissioners and the employees at the Washington office, etc.; and salaries, incidental expenses, rent, etc.; inspecting materials and supplies.

Mr. McCUMBER. But I will say to the Senator that it always includes something else with the salaries, such as the incidental expenses. So far as I can find, the item of labor is always considered as a part of and in connection with salaries.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will turn to page 8, he will see an estimate first of the expenditures already made, amounting in the aggregate to $4,000,000, which is stated, I think, in as much detail as is possible under the circumstances. That is wholly for material.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I understand that is wholly for material.

Mr. ALLISON. Then the second provision is for "Equipment purchased or contracted for delivery," amounting to $3,350,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. And most of that will be something that will not have to be duplicated.

Mr. ALLISON. Most of it is equipment for the purposes of the canal.

The next item, about $2,300,000, is in detail, and is chiefly for articles of a miscellaneous character necessary in conducting the work. I do not see in that estimate any special item referring to labor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Nor do I see, if I may disturb the Senator further, anything that divides the salaries in such a way that we can tell just what the amount of the continuing salaries will be per month or per annum, so that we may get some estimate of it.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think there is any estimate of the salaries separate and distinct from the labor, although it is easily ascertainable, I believe. I was trying to find the three-fourths for salaries and the quarter for labor which the Senator suggested.

I find another estimate of $800,000 in the aggregate, which includes transportation of labor and local transportation, hotel and hospital supplies, miscellaneous supplies and service, including lumber, etc. There seems to be very little labor in any of these items.

Then comes the estimate of the amount due through the Panama Railroad Company for material and services. That, of course, does not include labor. Then there is another one of the amount due the Panama Railroad Company from December to June, 1906.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator that I do not think he will find it. I have looked and I can not find it, and I merely asked the question because I did not know but that the Senator had the facts at hand, independent of the report.

Mr. ALLISON. I understood the Senator to say that he had discovered that a very small amount of this money was for labor.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I have not discovered the amount.

Mr. ALLISON. The pay roll on the Isthmus is estimated at $600,000 a month. That is chiefly labor. There may be a few salaries included in it, but very few. So the labor cost in this appropriation will average about $600,000 a month. I believe there are 17,000 persons employed.

I think we will be able to secure a reasonably fair estimate of the amount of labor——

Mr. McCUMBER. I call the attention of the Senator to an item which reads:

Estimated Isthmus pay rolls from December 1, 1905, to June 30, 1906.

I suppose that includes the entire pay rolls, as well as labor, does it not?

Mr. ALLISON. I presume it does. The greater portion, of course, is for labor or for the pay of persons who are to supervise the labor.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, on page 14 of the testimony Secretary Taft testifies that the pay roll amounts to between six and seven hundred thousand dollars a month.

Mr. ALLISON. Very good.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that includes the entire pay rolls, including labor and salaries.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt it does, but the chief portion is for labor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I fear I may repeat some of the questions asked by the Senator from North Dakota, because I did not clearly hear the colloquy, but I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa whether the item of $4,875,000 covers all of the pay rolls, both for labor and salaries, and whether or not any itemized statement was given of the salaries allowed the different classes of officials—engineers, topographers, etc.?

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, the Senator from Nevada will find that in detail on pages 270 and 271 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. ALLISON. Those statements are in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Pages 270 and 271 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It was submitted to the House of Representatives.

Mr. ALLISON. That covers all of the salaries. If the Senator will turn to the RECORD of December 6 he will find a complete statement of all the salaries.

Mr. GALLINGER. December 11.

Mr. ALLISON. December 6. It was put in the House by a Member.

Mr. KEAN. I find it on page 270.

Mr. ALLISON. So I think we have pretty full information on the question of salaries.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator what salaries are particularly criticised here? I find, for instance, that the salary paid to a physician is from $2,400 to $3,000. Is that regarded as excessive?

Mr. ALLISON. I think not. I have not heard any criticism of it. The criticism, I should say, is of salaries of $10,000 or more.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask how many salaries of that kind there are?

Mr. ALLISON. There are three or four salaries of $10,000. The purchasing agent receives $10,000 per year, the auditor receives $10,000, and the secretary receives $10,000.

Mr. BACON. May I ask the Senator from Iowa from what page of the RECORD he reads?

Mr. ALLISON. Page 138 of the RECORD, beginning on page 137.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ALLISON. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. While the Senator is on the question of salaries, I noticed in the celebrated interview with the Secretary of War at the Manhattan Hotel, in New York, that the distinguished lawyer, Mr. William Nelson Cromwell, was present as an adviser of the Commission. I should like to ask the Senator, if he has information on the subject, what the duties of that gentleman are in connection with that matter, and what salary he receives?

Mr. ALLISON. Is he regarded as the attorney of the Commission?

Mr. CULBERSON. He was present at this interview between the Secretary of War and Mr. Wallace, and represented, as I understood, the Commission.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh!

Mr. CULBERSON. What I desired to know is his real relationship to the Commission and what compensation he is paid and whether it is included in this appropriation we are to make.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not, as I understand. Mr. Cromwell, I understand, is one of the directors of the Panama Railroad Company. The directors consist of the seven members of the Commission and six other persons, of whom Mr. Cromwell is one. I see by reference to their reports that Mr. Cromwell is the attorney of the Panama Railroad Company, and I have no doubt if he was present in New York at the time stated it was in his capacity as director and adviser of the Panama Railroad Company.

Mr. STONE. In some correspondence between Mr. Shonts and Mr. Brown, who was the agent through whom the ships Havana and Mexico were purchased, Mr. Shonts refers to Sullivan and Cromwell as the counsel of the Commission.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I do not know how that is. He may also be the counsel of the Commission.

Mr. STONE. I wish to know how much he receives as salary.

Mr. ALLISON. But I would hardly think that the Commission needed counsel, unless in some special matter.

Mr. CULBERSON. I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting him again, but my attention was diverted for a moment and I did not catch his answer to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. ALLISON. I stated that if it appears in the record he signed himself as counsel of the Commission he must at the moment have been the counsel of the Commission, but I suppose it was for some special employment. I do not understand that he is the counsel of the Commission, as I do not think they would have a great amount of legal business to do which could not be done by their own counsel.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator, if I understood him correctly a moment ago in reply to the question which I asked him, stated his understanding to be that the compensation of Mr. Cromwell was not included in this appropriation. If that be the correct statement I will ask the Senator out of what money he is then paid?

Mr. ALLISON. If he is the counsel of the Commission undoubtedly he will be paid out of this appropriation. My statement was that he was the counsel of the Panama Railway Company, as I understood, and, if so, I suppose that as such counsel he will be paid by the railroad company. But if he is the counsel of the Commission, of which I have no evidence other than the statement of the Senator from Missouri, which was that he appeared in New York when this particular transaction occurred and was the counsel for the Commission in drawing up some contracts—is that the statement of Mr. Brown?

Mr. STONE. He was the counsel in drawing up contracts, and I understood that the whole subject-matter was in a measure to be submitted to his discretion.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I have no doubt he was paid for that service. I did not know he rendered that service.

Mr. CULBERSON. Can the Senator give us any information as to the amount of compensation, as we are on the question of salaries?

Mr. ALLISON. Of Mr. Cromwell?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. I could not. I have no information on that subject. I was not aware that he was counsel for the Commission until it was suggested to me now by the Senator from Missouri. But if he is the counsel I suppose he receives pay, and he would have to receive it out of this appropriation, if he has not already received it.

Mr. STONE. I do not wish to be understood as asserting that he was general counsel. I limit my statement.

Mr. ALLISON. To the particular transaction?

Mr. STONE. To this particular transaction, as it appears in the minutes of the Commission.

Mr. ALLISON. I see no statement here of compensation to counsel.

Now, I want to say a word about the salary of Mr. Magoon, who receives a compensation of $17,500. I believe a part of that compensation is $10,000 as governor of the Canal Zone, and he receives a salary of $7,500 as commissioner. He is minister to the State of Panama, for which an appropriation of $10,000 is annually made in the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

Mr. BACON. In addition, making $27,500?

Mr. ALLISON. Not in addition to it. I was about to place to his credit that previous appropriation of $10,000.

So it seems that even in the judgment of Congress, which is always careful about such matters and inquires into them particularly, they thought it worth while to pay $10,000 to a minister at Panama.

Mr. BACON. I will state to the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. ALLISON. I do.

Mr. BACON. When that appropriation was under consideration and it was fixed at $10,000 instead of $7,000—$7,000 being what the minister to Morocco gets, or something of that kind, if I am not mistaken. I recollect distinctly it was fixed at that sum in view of the disorganized condition of affairs down there, the climatic conditions, etc., but with no possible contemplation of the fact that the minister to Panama was to receive nearly an equal amount in addition from some other source.

Mr. ALLISON. I was only calling attention to it by way of illustration, that even in the judgment of Congress it was thought worth while to give a man a salary of $10,000 for the mission to Panama. Now it turns out that the President, with a view to economy, of course—I suppose so—has appointed Mr. Magoon our minister to Panama as well as governor of the Zone.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Judge Magoon, it seems to me, is holding a number of offices down there. He would seem to be rather a versatile man. I ask the Senator if he is the same gentleman who wrote the two celebrated opinions, one on one side and the other on the other side of the colonial question?

Mr. ALLISON. Very probably. I know of a great many lawyers who have expressed different opinions on topics at different times.

Mr. BACON. This was on the same topic though.

Mr. ALLISON. It does show that he is versatile, if that be true. I am told also that he is a very accomplished man and the author of some books upon law questions, and is recognized as one of the leading lawyers upon questions of international law that we have in our country.

So, Mr. President, I am merely illustrating this matter of salaries to show how easy it is to criticise without a full knowledge of the situation and of the subject. Now, take Mr. Benson. He is the auditor, I believe, of the Canal Commission. Mr. Benson was made the auditor of the Commission. I do not know precisely what is the nature of his duties except to audit these accounts, and I understand they are very voluminous accounts. Here are 13,000 or 15,000 people on the Isthmus at work. They are in the employ of the Commission, and each one of them of course must sign a pay roll once a month or once in two weeks. That requires a great deal of detail in auditing accounts. The man who preceded Mr. Benson, I believe, as auditor received a salary of $5,000, but Mr. Benson had a special qualification for this work, because of his large experience in auditing railroad accounts, for which I think he received a much larger salary. When he was made auditor, the Government of the United States having some little interest in the Panama Railroad Company, he was made auditor also of the Panama Railroad Company, and as auditor of the Canal Commission and auditor of the railroad company he receives practically a salary of $10,000. I do not know whether that is too large a salary or not. It seems to me to be large, and I appreciate the observations of the Senator from Georgia and I sympathize with him in his effort to reduce salaries, if they be excessive, to a just basis.

Therefore, I am in favor of making such a provision as will secure an absolute and detailed estimate of all these salaries, and as far as practicable of every expenditure necessary to be made on the Isthmus. I am in thorough sympathy with that purpose, and I believe it is amply provided for now in the bill as it came to us from the House, with the amendment we made following that provision, so as to read:

> And no money shall be expended for any of the purposes of constructing and maintaining said isthmian canal except in accordance with appropriations made by Congress.

I think, taking the two clauses together, we are very certain to secure a detailed estimate of what they need in the way of appropriations.

Mr. CULBERSON obtained the floor.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from Iowa does not recognize the propriety of the incorporation of this amendment upon the bill. The Senator is entirely in accord with the purpose which I seek to accomplish by this amendment, and his only objection to it is that he thinks it is surplusage, that the language of the bill as it is now before the Senate is sufficient to accomplish the purpose. I submit to the learned Senator that if that is the only reason, in the interest of certainty and for the purpose of satisfying the doubts of some of those of us who do not agree with him in that particular, it would be the better part to incorporate the amendment, or something which would be tantamount to it.

If the Senator does not object to what the amendment calls for, but that it is simply a matter of surplusage, that consideration is not so material as that by leaving it out it would put the matter in doubt, at least in the minds of some of us; and I shall endeavor to show the reason why I think there is doubt upon that subject.

I will say, Mr. President, that while I was very strongly impressed with the necessity of some distinct and definite requirement of law which would insure complete information to Congress, I was in doubt as to what particular shape it should take. But in the debate yesterday the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], than whom there is no more careful legislator and than whom there is no one more familiar with all the requirements upon appropriation bills and the things which are politic and proper to be done in the consideration thereof, in the course of his remarks suggested that the difficulty with which we were contending and which everyone was entirely sensible of, to wit, the lack of detailed and proper information relative to expenditures in the canal work, would be met by requiring, whenever we had to deal with a bill making appropriations for the isthmian canal, that there should be a detailed estimate from the Secretary of the Treasury, whose duty it is to present the estimates for all the Departments, if I understand correctly, with a view to having each office specified and the amount of salary to be received by each officer specified, so that when we came to make the appropriations we could deal as certainly and as definitely and as accurately with the amount to be appropriated as if it were an officer provided by law for whose compensation we were thus appropriating money.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I agree to that statement by the Senator from Maine. Perhaps I made a similar statement yesterday. The Senator from Maine suggested language this morning which I do not object to.

Mr. BACON. Very well; I am perfectly willing to have that amendment made in the language suggested by the Senator from Maine. It is substantially the same as the amendment offered by me.

Mr. ALLISON. But I think it is unnecessary.

Mr. BACON. I stated to the Senator, he will remember, that if the Appropriations Committee desire, in place of this amendment, to insert in that clause the language which was suggested by the Senator from Maine, I would yield to the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. I am willing to put in that language, except I think we ought not to restrict the President of the United States by including certain things. We ought to say that he should make this estimate as far as practicable. He will not play upon the words of this amendment.

Mr. BACON. I understand that. We are making a law not for President Roosevelt, but we are making a law for the entire time of the construction of this canal. So there is nothing personal in it as to him.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senator to this. It can not possibly be a restriction. There is no limitation of words. It says that while it shall be done as far as practicable, we particularize that whatever difference in judgment there may be as to what is or is not "practicable" it must include this and as much more as the President may deem to be covered by the language.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure. I wish, however, to make a further statement in that connection.

Mr. HALE. Then I will wait until the Senator concludes.

Mr. BACON. No; I will hear the honorable Senator.

Mr. HALE. I did not propose to strike out that part, "as far as practicable."

Mr. BACON. Not at all.

Mr. HALE. My proposition was to make it read, "which estimate shall cover all salaries and compensation to persons employed in said work except laborers, and shall be submitted to Congress."

Mr. BACON. I stated that that would be simply a change of position. It is exactly the same language as the amendment, and I am perfectly willing to have it inserted.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will indulge me a moment, as we are coming to an agreement upon this subject, I suggest that that is too restrictive. Take the employment on the Isthmus. It may be that for three months or six months there will be needed fifty engineers or overseers, if you please, or machinists. They are not laborers, but skilled mechanics and machinists.

Mr. BACON. I suggest that the Senator enlarge the language then.

Mr. ALLISON. I think you should not say he should make an estimate for everything except laborers, because it is in the nature of things that the people employed there will vary in number from time to time and vary in salary from time to time. They will be skilled people. So I think all you want to do is to provide for the people who are in this statement here, who are really the salaried people.

Mr. HALE. That is the purpose I had in view.

Mr. BACON. Certainly, that is the purpose.

Mr. HALE. Really to get at the salaried people. I thought the exception of laborers would include, as it undoubtedly would, skilled laborers too. But whether the language is broad enough or not, I have no objection to adding to it, to include laborers, skilled laborers, or any force required from time to time for any emergency.

Mr. ALLISON. I only called attention to the fact that you will require perhaps an impossibility. Now, if Senators think I am not right about that——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will insert the words "other than skilled or unskilled laborers," it seems to me it would cover the ground. That would limit it, then, to the salaries named, other than those of skilled or unskilled laborers.

Mr. ALLISON. Perhaps that would limit it.

Mr. HALE. That would cover it. I think it is very important that they should be excepted, because it is impossible for the President to estimate for that salaried force.

Mr. ALLISON. I know there are, or have been, employed there temporarily engineers and other people. They may be on a monthly salary, but they are employed temporarily, and when the particular thing that was required of them has been accomplished they pass away.

Mr. BACON. Those will be simply matters of estimate, I will say to the Senator, and those matters in contemplation——

Mr. HALE. This will cover it—"which estimates shall cover all annual salaries for persons in the employment of said Commission, excepting laborers and skilled laborers."

Mr. BACON. "Excepting skilled and unskilled laborers."

Mr. HALE. Their classification is "laborers and skilled laborers." They do not say "unskilled laborer."

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Maine whether it would not be advisable to suspend any legislation of this character until some regular bill comes in. The bill that is now under consideration is an emergency deficiency bill, and one where it is not supposed that legislation should exist at all. The understanding is, both in the Senate and the House, I think, that at this session of Congress there will be a bill that will cover this entire subject, and at that time these questions which have now not received adequate consideration can then be maturely considered not only in the committee but in the Senate after the bill has been reported.

Mr. HALE. That is precisely what I said. It is to provide generally that when the estimates are made it shall be for these salaries, but the question of what the salaries shall be in the meantime has got to be dealt with not by the Committee on Appropriations, but by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. All this requires is that the President, through the Secretary of the Treasury, shall submit estimates covering all annual salaries of persons employed, excepting laborers and skilled laborers; but how much they shall receive and the fixing of salaries, that neither the President will have to do with hereafter nor the Committee on Appropriations, but the Committee on Interoceanic Canals must make a complete schedule and fix salaries. Then it will all be subject to the general provision of estimates covering salaries. That is all it is intended to do here, and it ought to be done now, because whatever work the Committee on Interoceanic Canals does will blossom out in the form of needing money at the time the next appropriation is to be made. This is only intended, as I understand the Senator, to cover just that; it is only the process.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the Senator will allow me just a word there, I wish to——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CULBERSON. I understood that I had the floor. I yielded to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. I had the floor. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. Oh, no; I simply inquired as to what time I might say a word or two about the amendment which I proposed.

Mr. BACON. We have not disposed of this amendment. As soon as we have I will yield the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood that the Senator from Texas had the floor, but yielded to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia now has the floor.

Mr. BACON. The Chair is mistaken in that. I followed the Senator from Iowa, and I have never yielded the floor. I have submitted to interruptions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not refer to the moment, but to the yielding some half hour ago.

Mr. BACON. If I understand that the modification suggested by the Senator from Maine is acceptable to the Senator from Iowa I will have nothing further to say.

Mr. HALE. Let that be put in then.

Mr. SPOONER. Let it be read, so that we may know what it is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment as proposed will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 14, after the words "which estimates," insert the following:

shall cover all annual salaries for persons in the employ of said Commission excepting laborers and skilled laborers and.

Mr. HALE. There is no classification by the Department of unskilled laborers. It is "laborers and skilled laborers."

Mr. SPOONER. Who has the floor, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BACON. I said if that was acceptable I had nothing further to say.

Mr. CULBERSON rose.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Texas kindly yield to me to ask a question, to see if I can obtain a little information from the Senator from Maine? I only ask as to the custom of the Appropriations Committee. The estimates are the limit of appropriation, as I understand it.

Mr. BACON. We can not hear the Senator here.

Mr. SPOONER. Are the estimates the limit of the appropriation? That is, whatever is estimated the committee either appropriates for or it goes under the estimate?

Mr. HALE. Yes; that is the general rule. There are cases where before the final passage of a bill the heads of the Departments have come in and have said that exigencies require something even beyond the estimates, but those are exceptional cases which only prove the rule. It is, as stated by the Senator, that the estimates are considered as the limitation.

Mr. BACON. That refers to the aggregate of the estimates, not to the details of the salaries?

Mr. HALE. Of course each estimate is by itself.

Mr. SPOONER. The estimate is composed, I suppose, of the aggregate of all the salaries?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. The appropriation is to cover the same salaries that are considered in making up the estimate?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, what was the theory upon which the Committee on Appropriations reported this language, "in detail as far as practicable?"

Mr. HALE. That is the language of the House. The discussion arose afterwards about these salaries, and the estimates have come in, if you call them estimates. We have been proceeding, as the Senator knows, under his bill in rather—I will not say an indefinite way, perhaps, but without the particularization that there will be after the thing gets started as a running machine. Because of that and the necessity for more itemization of course the suggestion arose to put in something more. The general machinery that this shall be done through the Secretary of the Treasury is provided for in the bill itself in the House proposition. We did not put in that language in the committee; it is the House language.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not want to take the time of the Senator from Texas, but I think it is very much better language than the proposed amendment, and I wish to say a word on that subject when in order.

Mr. HALE. The amendment does not change the language. It only makes it a little more in detail.

Mr. SPOONER. It changes the language in a restrictive way, as I understand it. It strikes out practically, as I understand it, the words "in detail as far as practicable."

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. SPOONER. Do you leave that in?

Mr. BACON. That is left in. It does not strike out anything.

Mr. HALE. We do not want to strike out anything. The Senator from Iowa raised that same point, and I stated it.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not understand it.

Mr. HALE. Then I suggest, if there is no objection, that the amendment the Secretary has just read, to come in after the word "estimates," be agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the langauge. On page 3 of the original bill the language is "the President shall annually cause to be made, by the persons appointed and employed by him in charge of the government of said Canal Zone and the construction of said canal, estimates," and so forth. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine speaks of "said Commission." The word "Commission" does not precede in the section; it is the President. I suggest that instead of the word "Commission" it ought to read "the President."

Mr. HALE. In the words I suggested I did not say "Commission," but "employed in said work."

Mr. HOPKINS. The language, as I gathered it, given by the Senator to the Secretary, used the word "Commission." What has the Secretary?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 14, after the word "estimates," insert:

shall cover all annual salaries for persons in the employ of said Commission, excepting laborers and skilled laborers, and.

Mr. HOPKINS. The point I am making is that the Commission does not employ them.

Mr. HALE. In the memorandum I have (it was my lapse undoubtedly) it read "employed in said work." That is the proper suggestion, and I see no objection to that.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment which I submitted yesterday be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed yesterday by the Senator from Texas will be read.

Mr. HALE. Will not the Senator let us get this amendment out of the way?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly; I was about to ask if we could not have have a vote on it.

Mr. FRYE. Let the amendment be again read, as the Senator from Maine has now amended it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read by the Secretary as now proposed by the Senator from Maine.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, after the word "estimates," line 14, insert:

shall cover all annual salaries for persons employed in said work, excepting laborers and skilled laborers.

Mr. HALE. That is it.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, before that amendment is adopted, I desire to submit only a word or two upon it. I wish to call the attention of Senators to the fact that when this bill was sent from the other House to the Senate, it was thought by a number of the members of the Senate that it should go to a committee which could provide for legislation as well as for appropriation. That position was combated by the honored Senator who is in charge of the bill [Mr. ALLISON], and by his associates upon the Committee on Appropriations, on the theory that no legislation could be had at this time on this subject, but that the committee would be limited in the Senate to the question of appropriation alone. It was apparent to some then, as it is apparent to all now, that in order to make these appropriations, in order to properly protect the Government and to safeguard the interests of all concerned, in addition to the appropriations themselves which were contemplated in the bill as it came from the House, there should be legislation of the character which is now proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. It emphasizes the position which was taken when this bill was presented here from the other House, that it should have originally gone to the committee where all of these questions could have been embodied in the bill without the patchwork procedure which is now necessary, where the bill is reported, as it is, by the Committee on Appropriations and the legislation comes by various amendments from individual Senators upon the floor.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, has the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] been agreed to?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not yet been agreed to. The question is on that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, while the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is entitled to the floor, he has kindly consented to let me occupy five minutes, or thereabouts, as I have an engagement outside of the Chamber.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to submit a few very brief observations in reference to the matter of salaries, a subject that was discussed so thoroughly and earnestly by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], to whom I listened with a great deal of interest.

I have been of opinion that there are a few salaries in this list which are excessive, and yet I am not quite sure on that point. When the matter was before the Committee on Appropriations I thought that $30,000 was a very large salary for the chairman of the Commission. I also thought that $17,500 was a very large salary for the governor of the Canal Zone, who is likewise, I believe, a member of the Commission. I was very clearly satisfied that $10,000 for the secretary, who has been denominated a press agent, is entirely beyond reason, from the showing that he made before the committee when he was heard the other day; and I hope in due time that gentleman will either perform more work for the $10,000 he is receiving, or else that the salary will be reduced to, say $5,000, which Mr. Murphy received as secretary of the Commission before he was superseded by the gentleman who now holds the place. But in looking over the entire list of salaries, as it will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in two different places, I do not see that, as a rule, the salaries are excessive.

The salaries of the general purchasing officer and the general auditor have been somewhat criticised. They each receive $10,000 a year. Secretary Taft gave very important testimony concerning those officers, which will be found on pages 54 and 55 of the printed testimony. He likewise gave testimony concerning the salary of Mr. Stevens, the engineer in charge. The chairman of the committee asked this question of Secretary Taft:

Is there any explanation that you want to make about those details that would be useful to us?

Secretary TAFT. Well, I ought to say this: As to the fixing of the salary of the chief engineer, that was originally, with Mr. Wallace, $25,000. Then, after Mr. Wallace left us, we conferred with a man who we thought could follow him and take the responsibility, and he would not go to the Isthmus unless we paid him $30,000.

The CHAIRMAN. That is Mr. Stevens?

Secretary TAFT. That is Mr. Stevens; and it seemed to me that that, under the circumstances, was a reasonable salary. I conferred with the President about it. Mr. Shonts approved, and he and Mr. Shonts employed him at that price.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the criticism, so far as I have noticed it in the RECORD, was rather toward the employees here.

Secretary TAFT. Of the Commission?

The CHAIRMAN. The employees under the Commission who are not on the Isthmus at all.

Secretary TAFT. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. The auditor and so on.

Secretary TAFT. With respect to the auditor and the purchasing agent, Mr. Shonts came to me and said that he desired to get as good a man as he could get from the railroad service of the country to do the auditing and to do the purchasing. The purchasing of five or six or seven millions of dollars of supplies a year involves a skill and integrity and high character on the part of the purchaser that it seemed to me justified without any question the payment of $10,000. But an investigation was made as to what was paid for that service by the large railway systems of the country; and Mr. Shonts said that he had an opportunity to employ a gentleman who was in the Wabash system that he thought he could get for $10,000.

Mr. SHONTS. The Burlington system.

Secretary TAFT. I thought it was the Wabash. At any rate, whichever the system, he offered it to him; and the result was that the gentleman was employed at $12,000 a year and became a second vice-president of the company. I met him in St. Louis a few weeks ago, and he thanked us for the opportunity that our offer gave him to secure a better position. I think he is now a second vice-president of the Wabash.

Mr. SHONTS. That is it; he went from the Burlington.

Secretary TAFT. And he is getting $12,000 a year. The same thing is true of the auditor. The railway companies pay quite that price for auditors who are skilled in the matter of keeping railway accounts.

I observe that there has been a good deal of criticism of the fact that we have an auditor at all; that we do not rest on the Auditor of the War Department; that the Auditor of the War Department gets $4,000, and that the Secretary of War gets $8,000, and that there ought to be a uniform charge. All I have to say about that is that I do not think the Secretary of War gets enough, and I do not think that the Auditor, if he does his duty, gets enough. Still, there are people who are willing to serve the Government at that price, though you probably do not get as good as you would if you paid better salaries. But this was a great enterprise of construction, equivalent to the building and maintenance of a railroad, and I thought the standard of railroad salaries was a fair standard, and we found that we could not get the men unless we did.

With respect to the auditor, it is said that we can have an audit for nothing by the Auditor for the War Department. That is true; we can. But, gentlemen, there has not been a disbursing officer's account, there has not been a single account, passed by the Auditor of the expenditure of money for this canal since its beginning. That is the system of Government audit that we have; and those of us that were responsible for the carrying on of this great financial business were not willing not to have an audit closer to the time of expenditure and more of a business character than that which we get from the Government auditors. That is the truth of it; and that is the reason why we have an auditor that it costs $10,000 to have.

The CHAIRMAN. He keeps this audit up to date, as it were?

Secretary TAFT. He brings it down within six weeks, and after we get organized it will come down more closely. You can not get a statement from your auditors in the Government service here short of six months.

Senator PERKINS. A paymaster in the Navy informed me a few days since that his accounts had not been audited for eighteen months.

Secretary TAFT. You will hear that in all the Departments. Now, we can not carry on, or at least I should not be willing to carry on business at the risk of having accounts subject to examination eighteen months after the expenditure of the money.

Senator WETMORE. Do you mean that the auditing officials are incompetent, or that there is an insufficient force?

Secretary TAFT. I do not know the reason. I think it is because of the lumbering character of the methods of doing Government business. They require too much paper work and too great deliberation.

Senator HALE. Are those accounts afterwards sent to the Auditor for the War Department?

Secretary TAFT. Yes, sir.

Senator HALE. What does he do with them?

Secretary TAFT. He goes on, and in the course of time he will approve them; and some poor fellow who has been disbursing will find out three years afterwards that there are a few hundred dollars that he has disbursed, supposing they were a legal disbursement, that were not; and then he will either have to go down in his pocket and pay the amount, or he will have to come to Congress to have it adjusted in some way.

I speak of this because I know what happens in the Army. I know what the disbursing officers of the Army have to do in reference to delay in auditing. So we need, in a business matter like this, an auditor who keeps up to date.

Later on, in speaking of the purchasing agent, Mr. Shonts made this observation:

Mr. SHONTS. If you will permit me, I will say that he saved $193,000 on one purchase from the lowest bidder after he had the bids in and opened.

Senator TILLMAN. Will you explain that, please?

Mr. SHONTS. He did that by pointing out to them where they were charging us more than they should for different items entering into the construction of the cars and engines that were concerned.

Senator HALE. So that they changed their bid?

Mr. SHONTS. That was the lowest bidder. Now, mind you, he had the lowest bid; he did not change it. We go on the theory that it is beneath the Government's dignity to play one man against another; but after he had the lowest bidder in, he talked him out——

Senator HALE. And the bidder changed it?

Mr. SHONTS. The bidder himself—the lowest bidder—came down in his bid, and saved the Government $193,000.

Senator HALE. Which you would have spent if you had simply taken the figures of the lowest bidder as they came in?

Mr. SHONTS. That is it exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. In case an unskilled man had been purchasing agent?

Secretary TAFT. Yes, sir; in case an unskilled man had been purchasing agent.

Mr. SHONTS. Or a skilled man, if he had not known all those items and the relations that they should bear to each other. In three items, in three purchases, we have saved, according to an account I have kept, over $240,000.

Those were the reasons which the Secretary of War and Mr. Shonts gave for the payment of $10,000 salaries to the general auditor and to the general purchasing officer; and I confess that as a member of the committee it struck me that those salaries were warranted under the circumstances.

A single further observation. I have looked over the list of——

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me right there to interrupt him?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am speaking in the time of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], but I will allow a question.

Mr. HOPKINS. If I understand the testimony just read by the Senator, the saving of one hundred and ninety thousand and odd dollars came from the making of an entirely new contract.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all. They advertised for bids, and the lowest bidder was persuaded by this auditor that his bid was too high, and he reduced it.

Mr. HOPKINS. Suppose the auditor had also undertaken to persuade some of the other men who had bid for the contract, is there any evidence to show that they might not have gone below that?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no evidence on that point.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then, it resolves itself back to this, that after the bids were submitted, feeling that they were all too high, he went to negotiating personally and privately with one of them, and got him to make an offer $190,000 less than he had originally made.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, I want to know if it would not have been better to have rejected all of the bids, if it was the opinion of the party that they were too high, and to have given everybody an opportunity to make new bids?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, perhaps that might be so; but I am not going to discuss that, because I know nothing about it.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then, as a matter of fact, nobody can say that $190,000 was saved by that procedure. If the usual course had been pursued and if the bids had been rejected upon the ground that they were too high, instead of $190,000 being saved, there might have been a quarter of a million dollars saved.

Mr. GALLINGER. Possibly so; but I think the point the Secretary of War meant to make, and which impressed the committee, was that if this matter had been left in the hands of the Auditor for the War Department, a $4,000 officer who is probably overworked, he would have accepted the lowest bid beyond a question. That is the ordinary way in which those things go; but this technical man, this skilled man, thought these bids were too high, and in three different instances saved, not only $190,000, but $240,000 to the Government. I think that was good administration. It seems to me so. It is barely possible that the other bids might have been $50,000, $75,000, or $100,000 higher than this man bid—I do not know anything about that—so that it might not have been worth while to have bothered further with those gentlemen.

Now, I want to say but a word or two further. I have counted these different officers and employees of the Isthmian Canal Commission who are receiving salaries of more than $2,000 per annum, according to the statement set forth in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I find there are 226 of them. Thirty-five of them get $5,000 a year and over, and that includes the members of the Panama Canal Commission, as well as the highly salaried officials to whom I have made allusion. Fifty-eight of them get over $3,000 a year and less than $5,000, and 133 of them get less than $3,000. I have taken the trouble to count the men who get what I think is a very small salary, and out of that list of 226, 53 of them get $2,100 annually, or less than is paid to the clerks of the committees of this body.

I think the criticism is not well taken that these salaries are, as a rule, too high. It seems to me that some of them are too low. These 53 men occupy very responsible positions, as Senators will see if they will take the trouble to examine the character of their work on the Isthmus; and they are paid $2,100 a year—less, I repeat, than is paid the young men who are doing clerical work for the committees of this body and living comfortably here in Washington.

As I said in the beginning, I think there are a few salaries that perhaps are higher than they ought to be; but even in those few instances I would not feel like voting to reduce them, if I had the opportunity, without having more information than I have at the present time concerning them. These men perform exceedingly important duties.

I was impressed with the great responsibility that the Government has placed upon Mr. Shonts, a man whom I never saw until he appeared before the committee. He is not an engineer, but he is a man of great affairs, a man who has been in the habit of doing large things in the business world, a man who, beyond question, possesses exactly the qualifications which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] said a man in that position ought to possess; that is, the power to keep men at work, to organize them, to control them, and to bring results as a consequence of his great executive ability. I do not know but that the Government could find a man equally as good for less money; but there are few such men in the world—few men of that type—who can take control of a great manufacturing enterprise or a great railroad corporation or the construction of a great canal like this and get the best results out of it. If Mr. Shonts is that kind of man, $30,000, of course, is not worth discussing for a moment.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say. I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that when this list is analyzed it will be found that there are very few men in the entire list who are paid salaries that would warrant us in adversely criticising the Commission or the President for employing them at the rate of salary which is paid. I thank the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the amendment which I submitted yesterday be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 22, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be used to pay the expenses of a literary bureau connected with the Isthmian Canal Commission or pay the salary, compensation, or allowance, by whatever name called, of any person who may be engaged in such work for or in behalf of said Commission.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, while the purpose of this amendment is fairly obvious, a word or two about it may not be inappropriate. Prior to the selection of the present secretary of the Commission that place was held by another, who, so far as I know, was thoroughly competent, and who was paid a salary of $5,000. On account of the inhospitable climate of Panama, the occupant resigned the position of secretary and the present occupant of that office was employed and the salary of the office increased from $5,000 to $10,000. The salary was increased because, in addition to the ordinary duties of secretary, he was constituted the historian or the chief of the literary bureau, or the literary secretary of the Commission. In the hearing before the Committee on Appropriations he stated what his duties were with far greater frankness, in my judgment, than did the Secretary of War or the chairman of the Canal Commission.

This amendment has no personal feature. It is aimed at the innovation; it is aimed at the unhealthy policy which is attempted by these proceedings to be ingrafted upon government in this country. I repeat, Mr. President, though it is hardly necessary to do so, that the amendment is not aimed at a personality. I never heard of this gentleman before, but he seems to be a gentleman of education and intelligence, and, what is of far greater consequence in these times, an honest and a candid and straightforward man.

Now let us see what he says. I shall not weary the Senate with a long extract from these papers. When other witnesses undertook to befog the situation, to lay stress on his duties as secretary, and to minimize his duties as literary secretary, or chief of the literary bureau, this gentleman was frank enough to say:

Senator HALE. As you said a while ago, in answer to my question, it was understood you were the literary secretary?
Mr. BISHOP. Yes.
Senator HALE. Now, the keeping up of communication, the receiving of those newspapers, and so on, the seeing that clippings are made of criticisms upon the Commission, seeing that they are kept on file, and the furnishing of information to newspapers, and the interviews and speeches of the Secretary of War and members of the Commission, and keeping the general run of the relations of the Commission to the public, that is the main part of your duty?
Mr. BISHOP. It is the main part.

Now, Mr. President, I have thought that much was necessary in explanation of the purpose of this amendment, and I would have more to say about it and about the impolicy of this innovation except for the fact that the lack of wisdom in it, to go no further, is recognized by the Administration, and I am assured by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that this gross abuse, as I believe, of the use of public funds will be corrected in the administration of that office, and that no legislation is necessary. I understand that the assurance comes directly from the Administration that the impropriety of this attempt to create or to control or to direct public opinion with reference to one of the governmental agencies has been recognized, and that it will be done away with and eradicated without legislation. With that understanding, at the proper time I will withdraw this amendment, but only, Mr. President, in consideration of that assurance.

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CULBERSON. I have not concluded.

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield with pleasure to the Senator now.

Mr. HALE. I think it is entirely fitting that I should say something in relation to this matter brought out by the suggestion of the Senator from Texas. There is a difficulty in dealing with this situation by any legislative provision. The Senator has found that difficulty in framing any legislation or language that will meet the real evil. The real evil is recognized by everybody. As was stated in the debate yesterday, the Committee on Appropriations was a unit that this was an improper thing—that the duties of the secretary of this Commission should be changed from an actual secretary dealing with the business of the Commission to the work of building up a press bureau to deal with the newspapers; to collect information and select information and then disseminate it. That is not the business of the Government or any bureau of the Government.

The Committee on Appropriations was united upon this subject. It believed it to be an unfortunate, unjustifiable, and inexcusable innovation. The establishment and continuance of this office is an administrative measure. It is difficult to frame language that will reach this; but I am authorized to state here that the view taken by the Senator in offering his amendment, the view of the Committee on Appropriations, and of, I think, perhaps every Senator here, that it is an improper thing and a useless thing, and leads not only to no good result, but may be greatly abused, is recognized by the Administration; and hereafter the duties of this secretary, who, as the Senator says, personally appeared well—he did not attempt to dodge or in any way get away from the responsibility of answering questions plainly, but disclosed the whole situation—hereafter, as an administrative measure, the secretary of the Canal Commission is to be given administrative duties relating to the work of the Commission, and the whole form and machinery of what is called this "press bureau" is to be discontinued and abandoned. That will be done as an administrative measure, and there is no objection by anybody in the Administration to its being done. So I am glad that the Senator, seeing this and recognizing that what he seeks to accomplish will be accomplished, is ready to withdraw his amendment, so that we shall not be embarrassed with the difficulty of putting into words something that can be better done by administration.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I wish to add, with reference to the amendment, that I trust this assurance carries with it also the idea that this salary will be readjusted as well as the duties of the place.

Mr. HALE. All questions of salaries are to be settled afterwards by another committee. I can not say to the Senate, as I did about the other essential part, that I considered or brought up the matter of salary, but when the Committee on Interoceanic Canals takes up the question of salaries it will deal with this as with all other salaries. We did not propose on this bill to deal with salaries.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, while I have the floor I desire to speak briefly to the pending bill itself, without regard to any amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CULBERSON. Unless it is very important I trust the Senator will not ask me to yield any further.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas declines to yield.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will yield, if it is an important matter.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is touching the salary matter, and it can be taken up at another time.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, it is well known, at least to a number of Senators, that my preference was the Nicaragua as against the Panama route. Nor was I able to bring myself to support the treaty made between the United States and the sham Republic of Panama. It was my opinion then and it is my opinion now that the course of the Administration in that matter was indefensible in law and infamous in morals. Notwithstanding that, in spite of that, because it has become the law of the land and we ought to construct a canal somewhere, I intend to support this appropriation. While that is true, it is well to keep before the country the situation as to the finances of the canal. It is well to remind the people and the Senate now and then what was originally proposed and what is now being done.

The original estimate for the construction of the Panama Canal, Mr. President, was $184,000,000. We have already spent $76,500,000, and practically not a lick has been struck toward excavation. Practically all that has been accomplished there is in the line of sanitation. Now, of what does the $76,500,000 consist? In the first place, we gave to the bogus Republic of Panama $10,000,000, which was no more or less than a payment to the intrigants and conspirators there who organized in this city under the very shadow of the Capitol. In addition to that we have spent $10,000,000 in the last year or two at Panama in the high, if not extravagant, salaries and in work which Mr. Shonts tells us, in his testimony before the Committee on Appropriations, was ill advised and improvident. In addition to that, we spent in a lump $40,000,000, paid to the Panama Canal Company; and what did we receive in return therefor?

Let me itemize the $40,000,000 for a moment, if you please. We gave $2,000,000 for the plans and specifications and maps of the old company, extending over a period of twenty-five years, which the Commission in its report to the President, in 1904, declared to be utterly worthless and useless, unsuited to the character of canal that the Government of the United States contemplates constructing. We gave $4,000,000 of the $40,000,000—and I speak only in round numbers—for machinery, and the Commission tells us in the report of 1904, as well as in the report of 1901, that it is largely unsuited to present conditions and will be of no great service to the Government at all. We gave $6,888,000 for the Panama Railroad stock, and there was a mortgage at the time of $3,490,000 upon the road and its property; and consequently we have lost at least the latter sum. We then gave $27,500,000 for what had been done in the way of excavation, and all the witnesses tell us—I mean all of the reports and data which we have here upon the subject—that a large proportion of that work will be of no service to us hereafter.

Now, in addition to all that, with reference to the $40,000,000, in estimating that the property was worth that sum, the Commission added about 30 per cent for contingencies. They added, therefore, to what they regarded as the real value between ten and twelve million dollars, and brought the amount up to $40,000,000, which we paid to the canal company.

So I say, Mr. President, if you take the $40,000,000 in itself and dissect it and analyze it, you will find that we have paid somewhere between fifteen and twenty million dollars for property which is utterly worthless, and the money might as well have been thrown into the sea at Panama.

What is the other item constituting the $76,500,000 we have either spent or contracted to spend on the Isthmus? It is the $16,500,000 which is estimated for by the Secretary of War in his report to Congress. At this hour of the day I shall not attempt to go into that in detail, but I wish to make two fundamental criticisms, because I shall vote for the bill, notwithstanding it is subject to this criticism. I will vote for it because I will not have my motives misjudged, and because I want to see the canal constructed if it can be. I say I offer two fundamental criticisms upon this estimate of sixteen and a half million dollars.

The first is that we propose to spend now within several months this extraordinary sum of money when we have not yet determined the character of the canal we propose to build. Now, it is true the Secretary of War tells us that in his judgment eleven millions of it may be wisely spent, notwithstanding we have not yet determined the type and character of the canal. If it were a question of law, if it were a question of governmental policy, I would accept the opinion of the distinguished Secretary of War, but I dare say that he is a very indifferent engineer.

The second criticism, Mr. President, that I would offer to this appropriation of $16,500,000 is this: It is proposed to spend or contract for the expending of this enormous sum of money, when it has not yet been determined whether we will do the work there directly by the Government or by contract, and the question is under debate and under discussion now in Administration circles, as I understand.

With reference to the salaries, I wish to say while some of them seem to be too large, approaching the extravagant and the exorbitant, the conditions at Panama are different from what they are here and may in a sense justify larger salaries there than under ordinary conditions here. At the same time, it ought to be borne in mind that these salaries are higher than are paid or have been paid by the Government in any other of its Departments at any period of its history; and the committee ought to give due heed to that fact.

There are no Government salaries with which they can be compared. It was intimated here the other day that these salaries could only be compared with the salaries received by missionaries and philanthropists and retained lawyers in the insurance business. But, Mr. President, I have too much respect for the distinguished gentlemen who are engaged in this great governmental work in Panama to institute such a comparison.

The higher officers and some of the directors of the three largest insurance companies in this country constitute, in my judgment, the greatest aggregation of lordly thieves and unconscionable perjurers this age of graft has yet developed. They reach in every direction, lay hold of every class of men, and invade every party. They traffic, sir, in political influence as they would in the wares on the merchant's shelf or in the market place. They have invaded the sanctity of legislatures, State and National, and to me one of the deeply humiliating things is that they found a Democrat upon whom they fastened their graft at 25 per cent of what they paid a Republican of similar commanding position in his party. But enough of that. At some later time during the progress of this session I hope to take occasion to pay my respects at length to some of these insurance methods.

I said, Mr. President, that I intend to vote for this appropriation. In doing so I do not abate in the slightest my contempt for the robber diplomacy which acquired Panama and established there this miserable mock Republic. I shall support this appropriation because, among other reasons, I do not intend that my vote—and I hope no other vote on this side of the Chamber—shall hereafter be used as an excuse by the Administration for the disaster which may follow this undertaking. So far as I am concerned, the Administration must go right on with all reasonable funds that may be necessary until the feasibility of building the canal at Panama is either established or refuted.

The course of the Administration in this affair in the beginning was characterized by intrigue and lawlessness. It has since been marked by favoritism and extravagance, if not profligacy, and it will probably end in utter and disgraceful failure.

My sympathies, Mr. President, go out to the American people who have been deceived—deceived as to the cost of the canal; deceived as to the engineering and climatic difficulties in Panama. It is to be hoped—I do hope, Mr. President, although I believe the canal, if built at all, will cost hundreds of millions of dollars as against $184,000,000 which was originally estimated—I say I do hope the American people will be spared further disappointment and humiliation. But, Mr. President, there are indications that a retributive justice is laying the weight of its hand upon conduct which grossly discredited and dishonored the nation in the beginning.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, on Thursday I propounded an inquiry to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] concerning the purchase of ships by the Canal Commission for service between New York and Panama. That inquiry led to a colloquy between the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and myself. Since then I have looked a little further into the matter, following his suggestion that I should, and I desire now to add something to what was said at that time.

On Thursday I stated that during the spring and early summer months it had been declared by the President, Secretary of War, and the Canal Commission that it was their settled policy, in procuring ships and material for the canal, to go into the open market and buy whatever was needed wherever it could be bought the cheapest.

That declared policy was widely exploited through the press. I have taken occasion to have copied some extracts from one of the leading papers of the country, the Washington Post, and I desire now to read them, because they show what the policy was and are samples of the way in which it was exploited.

From the Post of May 16, 1905, I read:

A new and very important policy was entered upon yesterday by the Isthmian Canal Commission, when members of its executive committee decided to purchase both materials and ships in the markets of the world. This was approved by Secretary Taft.

* * * * * * *

This decision with regard to the canal was reached with some reluctance, because it was appreciated by Secretary Taft and the executive committee that there would surely be a great outcry from two great interests in this country—the producers of material and the shipowners—if the purchases were not limited to the American product.

But it was decided that the money consideration was so great that it could not be ignored, for it was held that in cases fully 50 per cent more would be charged for material needed in canal construction than the same goods could be procured for in Europe.

Chief Engineer Wallace, for instance, showed that two ships, in addition to those running between New York and Colon and owned by the Panama Railroad Company, were absolutely necessary to carry the food supply and material needed for the work. No American ships could be bought at any reasonable price, and when it came to building such ships it was found, according to Secretary Taft's statement, that while you could buy two 6,000-ton ships in Europe for $750,000, it would cost $1,400,000 to build such ships here. And, in addition, while the European ships could be had at once, it would take at least eighteen months to secure American boats. Therefore it was decided to buy the ships in Europe, or, rather, in any port where they could be had the cheapest and obtained the quickest.

* * * * * * *

Secretary Taft explained yesterday that he felt obliged to indorse this decision. * * * And in this connection he called attention to the following recommendation contained in the first report of the Isthmian Canal Commission:

"An important question of policy is yet to be determined. If the Isthmian Canal Commission is not bound by any restriction of Congress as to where it shall purchase machinery, material, and supplies, then it would seem to be its duty to construct the canal as cheaply as possible, and buy what it needs where it can get it cheapest."

Again, from the Post of May 17, 1905:

In his report to the President on the 12th of last January, Secretary Taft said:

"If the Isthmian Canal Commission is not bound by any restrictions of Congress as to where they shall purchase machinery, material, and supplies, then it would seem to be their duty to construct the canal as cheaply as possible, and so to buy what they need where they can get it the cheapest."

Again, in the Post of May 20, 1905, Mr. Theodore P. Shonts, the chairman of the Commission, is quoted as saying:

The Commission has simply been forced to take this position in the matter of purchase of supplies and ships. * * * The Commissioners must, in keeping their oaths, build the canal as cheaply, not as possible, but as cheaply as practicable. With regard to the ships we are to buy, it is necessary to go abroad for them. We simply can not get them in this country, and so what are we going to do?

And the Post added:

The Canal Commission has had in view two 6,000-ton vessels, which could be purchased abroad immediately. The necessity of having these ships and the impossibility of securing American bottoms caused the decision of a few days ago to buy foreign steamers. Whether the chartered vessels will be foreign or domestic bottoms depends upon the prices asked.

Again, the Post of May 27 published what purports to be an extract from a speech delivered by Secretary Taft at Cincinnati, Ohio, on the evening of the 26th of May, which is as follows:

If the Panama Canal were inside the territory of the United States, of course all material used on the canal would pay duty or be bought in the United States, but as the construction of the canal is a number of days' journey from the tariff wall of the United States it presents exactly the same case as is presented in the case of the Philippine Islands. Now, if Congress wants to pay more than France was willing to pay, then they are welcome to do so, but in the absence of a rule we feel we must carry out the rule that applies. That law requires that, prices and qualities being the same, we must buy American goods. In the absence of a rule we feel bound by our trust to build as cheaply as possible. We submitted the question to Congress on this line, asking Congress to lay down a rule. If there is no rule, we must build as a business man would build. No; there is no question of protection or free trade; it is merely our duty under the law as it stands. If the rule is changed, then we must change.

These things were printed in the Post, and simultaneously similar things were printed in practically all the leading journals of the country. This shows that the Secretary of War and the Canal Commission, of course with the approval of the President, had, after mature deliberation, determined upon the policy of buying ships and material in the open markets of the world, giving preference to American products where quality and prices were substantially the same. There can be no doubt that that policy was determined upon and declared.

Mr. President, I approved of that policy in the main, and was delighted—"dee-lighted"—when I saw that the President of the United States and his subordinates had declared for it. I know of course that Republicans, I mean orthodox Republicans, did not approve of it. They did not approve of it because a policy of that kind was a direct blow, or would have been if carried out, at our navigation and tariff laws. These laws are the twin pets of the Republicans of the country—that is, of orthodox, stalwart Republicans. They are responsible for enacting them and boast of the fact. They are written in their confession of faith. But they are laws which have not and do not commend themselves to me or to those with whom I act in the world of politics, for under the operation of one of them our merchant marine has been destroyed, and the effect of the other is not only to impose grievous burdens upon the great mass of Americans, but it is to-day shadowing our foreign commerce with gravest danger. And so believing, when it was announced that the President and his subordinates would force the special beneficiaries of these laws into some sort of reasonable competition in furnishing canal supplies, the announcement received my instant and hearty approval. I supposed it was sincerely made. It was boldly declared and repeated everywhere and in many ways—in interviews, in public speeches, and in official utterances. But my rejoicing was of brief duration. For some reason a retreat has been sounded. The President has backed out. His oft-declared policy has been abandoned. There was tremendous thundering in the index, but a pitiable fizzle at the finish.

On Thursday I asked why this policy as to the purchase of ships had been abandoned. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] made answer, and, among other things, suggested that I might inquire of the Department. I did so. I received a printed copy of the minutes of various meetings held by the Isthmian Canal Commission. I wish to read the part of the minutes of one of those meetings which was marked, as I understood, by the secretary of the Commission when he kindly sent the book to me. I read as follows:

The chairman presented to the meeting the matter of acquiring steamers to be operated between New York and Colon, especially for the carriage of the material and supplies in the construction of the canal. He reported that the steamers at present employed by the Panama Railroad Company were entirely inadequate to meet the increased freight movement occasioned by the shipments of supplies for use in the construction of the canal; that also the passenger movement to and from Colon had greatly increased, due to the transportation of employees to the Isthmus for work in connection with the construction of the canal; that it was necessary to secure steamers especially adapted for the transportation of cargo and passengers and approximating 5,000 tons burden, with a speed of at least 16 knots and with an economical coal consumption, and also with exceptionally large hatches and between decks. He also reported that the railroad company had sent abroad its general agent, Mr. Farnham, to visit the principal shipping ports of Europe and to report upon vessels of the requisite capacity and size and adapted to the requirements of this trade that might be there acquired; that Mr. Farnham has covered the whole field of inquiry abroad in the most thorough fashion, and the chairman had exchanged with him frequent cables concerning the progress of his inquiries and the nature and character of vessels that might thus be purchased; that several ships abroad were thus offered, but that they were considerably less in speed—than 16 knots, and the passenger accommodations were not well adapted to tropical service; that the chairman had opened negotiations with the Ward Line for the purchase of the two steamers Mexico and Havana, owned by that line and in operation between New York and Cuba; that the asking price was $700,000, and that two lower offers had been refused until a few days ago, when an offer of $650,000 each by the chairman had led to acceptance; that these vessels are 5,500 tons each, and capable of sustaining a speed of 16 knots, and accommodate 100 first-class and 50 second-class passengers; are provided with large hatches and side ports, enabling the shipment of heavy cargoes; can be immediately turned over for use; that the increased speed of these vessels will save four days on each round trip, giving five round trips a year more than any foreign vessel available; that these vessels were built for the tropical trade, and therefore are specially adapted for the New York-Colon service; that accordingly and after full discussion of the subject with the Secretary of War the chairman has authorized the purchase of these vessels at the price mentioned.

I read the whole of it, for it is fair that it should go in the RECORD. I suppose, Mr. President, that the preparation of these minutes constitutes a part of the work of that ornamental, Argus-eyed purveyor and dispenser of canal literature known as the "historian," who has been employed at an annual salary of $10,900 to guard the Commission against the machinations of the wicked world outside. But though it comes, as I presume it does, from his pen and is a creation of his genius, it is in the nature of an explanation and bears the tone of apology; and well it might, for to my thinking it approximates an absurdity to say that in the ports and shipyards of England, France, and Germany no two ships could be purchased that would answer the needs of this Commission. To me it is absurd to say that in those countries, whose merchant ships are swarming all over the world and whose flags are mirrored in every sea, two ships could not be found suitable for the service desired, but could be found only in the United States, whose merchant marine has been so far destroyed that it ranks at the very foot among the great nations of the world.

Besides, Mr. President, only shortly before these ships were purchased and this record made, and when this policy of buying ships in the open market was still alive and afoot, the chairman of the Canal Commission and other officials declared that they were forced to go abroad to buy because the ships could not be had at home. That was one reason they gave for buying abroad and in justification of that course. Certainly no change occurred in this respect between the month of May, when these declarations of their purpose were made, and the month of July, when the purchase was made. The reason given now for buying at home is wholly at variance with the reason given in May for buying abroad.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], replying to my inquiry on Thursday, said:

The Secretary of War did attempt to buy ships abroad, but I think if the Senator from Missouri will make careful inquiry of the Department he will find that the Secretary failed to find any foreign ships that met the requirements of the Department. After exploiting that matter abroad, in England particularly, he turned his attention to the United States, and he found the Ward Line had two ships that exactly suited the purposes, and he purchased them for $650,000 apiece, which, it has been stated by experts, was a very reasonable amount. There are now being built, I will say to the Senator, in the United States shipyards two ships to take the place of those the Ward Line sold to the Department.

Mr. President, it is stated in one of the extracts I read in the beginning, as upon official authority, that there were two 6,000-ton ships in England suitable to this trade that could be bought for the sum of $750,000 for the two. Now, we find that the Commission two months later paid $1,300,000 for the Havana and Mexico. But the Senator from New Hampshire says that this much larger price was paid and that they were bought because they were suited to the use they were to be put to and because no foreign ships so well adapted to that use could be had. It appears from the minutes of the Commission, from which I have read, that one of these ships at the time of its purchase was undergoing repairs or alterations. How good these ships were I do not know. This I do know, that they were built by the Cramps, in Philadelphia, in 1898 and 1899. So they are 6 and 7 years of age. I have been told, Mr. President, by gentlemen who are qualified to speak on the subject by reason of their practical experience in the ship business, that it is the universal custom among the owners of ships to write off 5 per cent of the value of a ship every year it is in use. If that be true, then on that account these ships have depreciated 30 and 35 per cent, respectively, on their original value, or on their value as new ships.

In addition to that, I am told by the same gentlemen that the life of a ship's boilers is about eight years, on the average, and that when the boilers have become exhausted it will cost about 15 per cent of the original cost of the vessel to replace them. There are Senators sitting before me now very familiar with this subject, and I ask them to correct me if my statements are not predicated on the facts.

If the data I have given be correct—and I have no doubt that it is—then it is clear that the two vessels we have bought were at the time of the purchase worth little more, if any more, than half what they were worth when new.

Again, I call attention in this connection to the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire, that there are now being built in shipyards in the United States two ships to take the place of those the Ward Line sold to the Canal Commission. We bought those ships in July. It requires but eighteen months, or about that, to build ships of that description. Why has it become necessary within two or three or four months—I am indefinite because I do not know when the commission was given for the construction of the new ships—but we bought the old ships in July, and since then the Senator from New Hampshire says the Government has entered into contract with American shipyards to build new ships to take their place.

Mr. SPOONER. The Government?

Mr. STONE. I said the Government, but the Senator from Wisconsin corrects me, and properly, for the Senator from New Hampshire did not say that the Government was building new ships, but that they were being built to take the place of the old ones. Mr. President, are they being built by the Ward Line or by the Government, does the Senator know?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know, but I infer from the observations of the Senator from New Hampshire that the Ward Line was building those two ships to take the place in their service of the ships they had sold; but I may be mistaken.

Mr. STONE. For use in their own services?

Mr. ALLISON. In the Ward Line. That is what I suppose.

Mr. STONE. I did not so interpret the statement.

Mr. SPOONER. That is the way I understood it.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from New Hampshire is not present.

Mr. GALLINGER entered the Chamber.

Mr. SPOONER. Here he is now.

Mr. STONE. Of course if that is what the Senator from New Hampshire meant, I have no wish and there can be no object in pressing that further.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator refer to the two ships purchased by the War Department?

Mr. STONE. Yes. I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire just what he meant when he said on Thursday that two ships were being built to take the place of those sold by the Ward Line to the Government? Who is building them, and for what purpose?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have an impression that they are being built in the Cramp shipyards, of course for service in the Cuban trade, where the Ward Line runs.

Mr. STONE. For the Ward Line?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. I so understand. If the Senator will permit me a moment, it has been suggested to me that the Senator has been discussing the matter of the purchase of those two ships. I think I have accurate information when I say to the Senator that the Secretary of War sent an agent to Europe—in fact, that was well known to some of us—for the purpose of buying two ships for this service. He found two ships that could be bought for $750,000—$375,000 each. They belonged to a concern that had failed, and it was a bargain-counter affair; but before he closed his contract for those ships, they were sold to other parties, and hence could not be secured. I can not definitely say that they would have been accepted even if other parties had not stepped in and taken the ships; but that is the presumption.

This agent then looked around for other ships and failed to find ships that could be purchased which answered the requirements of the Department. He came home and so reported; and the Department purchased the Ward Line steamers. That is the information in regard to that matter I get, and I think it is entirely authoritative.

Mr. STONE. That is what the Senator said on a former occasion.

Mr. GALLINGER. Except that I did not say that other parties had purchased the ships, which I do now, as it has been shown to me to be a fact.

Mr. STONE. I do not question the statement of the Senator; but I did and I do question the statement put forward as the excuse or reason for abandoning the policy entered upon of purchasing ships abroad if they could be purchased there for vastly less money—namely, that suitable ships could not be had in Europe and could be had only in the United States. I remarked, and without meaning to be offensive I repeat, that that statement under all the circumstances seems to me to be wholly unreasonable, if not positively absurd.

I have wondered, Mr. President, and do yet, what influence operated to induce the Secretary of War and the Canal Commission, and the President himself, to change their policy, and to beat an inglorious retreat.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say that I am not in the confidence of the Secretary of War or of the President concerning this matter. I will say to the Senator that I am one Member of this body who has felt, and who now feels, that so far as the Panama Canal construction is concerned, we ought to give our patronage to Americans rather than to foreigners, and I think it would have been a reproach to this great nation of ours, in view of the fact that we are now carrying only 9 per cent of our imports and exports in American ships, to have British ships carrying our supplies to the Panama Canal. That is my judgment; but I do not speak for the Secretary of War or for the President. I do not know what influenced them. I have been told that after those two ships, which were partly bargained for, escaped the vigilance of the gentleman who was sent over there by the Department and they failed to find in the British market two other ships that would answer the requirements, he came home and the Department made this purchase.

Mr. STONE. I know, Mr. President, without being told, that the distinguished and able Senator from New Hampshire is in favor of the policy he has announced, that all of the supplies for the Panama Canal should be purchased in the United States, and that without regard to the difference in the prices here and in foreign countries.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, Mr. President, unless our tariff duties could be applied to those purchases abroad, I am in favor of purchasing in the American market; and I was exceedingly gratified the other day to have the Secretary of War say to the Committee on Appropriations that they were purchasing 98 per cent of such supplies in the American market. I am glad they do it.

Mr. STONE. I know the Senator is glad, but that is not the point. The President and the Secretary of War were not glad, so they said, as the Senator is glad, at least not so glad that they were willing to pay from 40 to 80 per cent more for supplies, enormous in quantity, than they could buy them abroad for, for the mere privilege of getting them at home. I am speaking of this Republican Administration. On the contrary, they said that they esteemed it their duty, that they were under a public obligation "to purchase where they could buy the cheapest." True it is asserted by some newspapers, as coming from these officials, that this declared policy of buying abroad was made as an admonition or threat for the purpose of coercing American manufacturers and shipowners into selling to the Government at lower prices. But I can hardly believe that the President would make a false play for the purpose of coercion. If so, it failed, and the coercers were coerced. In any event, the views held by the Senator from New Hampshire are not in accord with those projected by the Administration. The Secretary of War and the chairman of the Canal Commission as late as May were unwilling to pay $1,300,000 for two ships the like of which they said they could buy abroad for practically half that sum. The President is reported in one interview as denouncing as outrageous any proposition that such enormous prices should be paid.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, I wish the Senator would put that interview into the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. With the Senator's permission, I should like him to read that interview. I have heard no suggestion from any source that the price paid for these ships was an exorbitant price.

Mr. STONE. I did not say that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understood the Senator to say it was an outrage.

Mr. STONE. I said that the proposition or demand that $1,300,000 or $1,400,000 should be paid for ships in the United States, which could be bought abroad for substantially half that sum, was an outrage.

Mr. GALLINGER. It would have been an outrage if they demanded an exorbitant price for their ships; but that is the very thing I have never heard questioned, that $650,000 was an exorbitant price.

Mr. STONE. I have seen no statement of that nature since these ships were purchased. All such statements were before the purchase, and naturally so.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will again permit me, if his contention be that the Government, regardless of the interests of the American people, ought to have gone abroad and bought everything for this canal, this great amount of material that has been brought in here, evading the payment of our tariff duties, is a correct contention, why, Mr. President, we might as well go to free trade now as at any time.

Mr. STONE. I have not said that I favor going abroad to buy the materials for this canal. On the contrary, I have said, and say now, that I would esteem it to be the duty of the administrative officers to buy the material and ships at home if they could be purchased at substantially the same prices and of substantially the same quality. But I am opposed, Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not interrupt the Senator, Mr. President, in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. STONE. But I am opposed to the Government buying at home, tariff or no tariff, navigation laws or none, materials or ships, and paying 40 or 50 per cent more for them than they can be had for abroad, and paying also very largely in excess of the prices at which American goods are sold for export.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, with the Senator's permission——

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator knows that American ships can not be bought as cheaply as ships can be bought in England, France, Germany, Norway, or any other of the maritime nations of the world. The Senator knows—I am sure he knows—that we are paying a much higher price for labor in this country in shipyards than is being paid in any other country in the world, that it costs a great deal more to build ships here than it does to build ships abroad. The Senator knows that we can buy woolen goods for the American people much cheaper in Great Britain than we can in this country, but the policy of our Government has been not to take foreign goods simply because they are cheaper, but it has been to compel those nations to pay a tariff duty that will practically put these goods, so far as cost is concerned, on an equality with those manufactured in our own country, so that we can pay our laborers, our wool-growers, and others a better rate of wages than is being paid abroad. I do not think the Senator means that we ought to buy British ships simply because they are cheaper——

Mr. STONE. I did not say so.

Mr. GALLINGER. And close up our American shipyards and dismiss our American workmen and simply depend upon foreigners to furnish us with what we consume in our country. That has been argued by some, but I do not think the Senator from Missouri would argue it.

Mr. STONE. That, of course, Mr. President, is the old argument in favor of maintaining our tariff schedules and navigation laws. I do not care at this time to enter into that discussion to the extent the Senator indicates; but I will say, while it is true that the cost of building a ship in the United States is larger than that of building one in Europe, the difference is not so great as the Senator would have us believe. The difference is not so great that it is necessary to sell an American ship for double, or practically double, the price of a similar foreign ship in order to save the American owner from loss. The difference in the cost of building ships here and in Europe consists chiefly in the higher labor cost and not in materials. Primarily I favor free ships, but I will not go into that now. I am as anxious as the Senator can be to restore our merchant marine, but I will not go into that now. However, I will say that we can not put our flag on the sea, we can not rehabilitate our maritime interests by selling old ships or new ones at exorbitant prices, and we do that whenever they are sold at practically double the price of foreign ships. Whenever that is done it is an outrage, whether the President said so or not. Possibly it was just such arguments as that now made by the Senator from New Hampshire which prevailed with the President and the Secretary of War to change their policy.

When that policy was announced many distinguished Republicans, among them the Speaker of the last House of Representatives, a distinguished Member of that House from Pittsburg, the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and others, cried out against it; and many publications devoted to the protected interests cried out against it; and some were so emphatic that they declared that they would resist the policy. Pressure, enormous pressure, was brought to bear upon the President and the Secretary, and I believe they were forced, for political reasons, to abandon the policy they had entered upon.

Mr. President, I have accomplished the purpose I had in view. I wanted to call attention to these facts, for they afford a most interesting and instructive object lesson, so far as our navigation and tariff laws are concerned. I am only sorry that the President surrendered to pressure.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I must confess that the short study which I have given to the various reports upon the subject has rather confused my mind. I find many plans which have been evolved in the different stages of this construction—three, four, or five, I believe—varying according to the determination as to whether it shall be a sea-level canal and varying according to the number of locks employed. But during this debate certain impressions have been made upon my mind regarding the administration of the work of this canal which I should like to present to the Senate.

Whilst, of course, we should be critical of this work in its early as well as in its later stages, I think that we should also be tolerant in the earliest stages, for the Government has been suddenly thrown into a work of construction of great magnitude under legislation which contemplates the speedy construction of this canal, backed by a public sentiment which is impatient of delay.

It is not to be wondered that there should be some impulsive and even hysterical work done in the early stages. The people wished to see dirt fly, and the Administration doubtless wished to meet the views of the people, and perhaps too much haste has been made. We have an evidence of it in the fact that $500,000 has been expended in removing dirt which later on will have to be removed to another place.

It is also clear that the work of construction should not have been entered upon until the work of sanitation was complete. The Administration has seen its error in that particular, and of late the entire effort of the Administration has been applied to the question of sanitation. But there is a consideration which I should like to present to the Senate, and that is as to whether we are not responsible in part for defective administration thus far.

I think it is conceded by all men connected with great corporate enterprises that the responsibility of a great work must be individualized; that it must be put upon one man; that that man must appoint his assistants for the different branches of the work and hold them responsible to him, and that these assistants in their various areas of control shall pursue the same method.

At the very start we did not individualize this responsibility. It is true we intrusted the work to the President, but instead of giving him a free hand in organization we instructed him that he should do this work through a commission, and we ourselves designated in great part the personnel of that commission. We provided for a commission of seven. I think that was a mistake. I think we should have put upon the President of the United States the responsibility for this work; that we should not have permitted him to share that responsibility with any commission of this kind. We should impose upon him the duty of appointing his own subordinates, individualizing responsibility everywhere as far as possible.

It is not to be wondered at that we should make mistakes in organization at first, for the United States Government has not been accustomed to great works of construction. We are now entering upon an era of construction, and I believe the area of our work in that particular will increase until it finally embraces governmental public utilities which are not now dreamed of.

The only other great work of construction upon which we have entered was entered upon under a law passed almost simultaneously with the act under which the President is acting, and that was the irrigation law. There we individualized responsibility. We shaped a most comprehensive bill; provided a fund from the sale of public lands through which construction should be conducted, and provided a revolving fund so that the money could be used over and over again as the lands reclaimed were sold.

But he gave the Secretary of the Interior full power to execute the law, and he placed no limit upon that power except that he should not make a contract for construction unless the money for its payment was actually in the fund.

What did the Secretary of the Interior do under that act? He referred the administration of the act to the Geological Survey, a scientific branch of the Government which for years has been engaged not simply in geological research, but in the study of everything that relates to the topography and resources of the country, to our mineral deposits, to the measurement of streams, to the control of streams for navigation as well as irrigation, and which, during the formative process of the irrigation agitation, had been engaged in making plans for the great work that was subsequently to be entered upon.

The Director of the Geological Survey has demonstrated administrative capacity of a very high character. Although his special scientific specialty was the examination of fossils, yet the expanding area of his bureau had turned him gradually into a great administrator. His capacity has been recognized by Congress, by our Appropriations Committees, and by all who have been brought in contact with him by a prompt acquiescence in almost everything he has asked. He has been termed in this body the greatest getter of appropriations in the service of the Government, and he has procured these appropriations simply because he has been direct and straightforward, has presented his plans clearly, and without urgency, and has placed upon the committees of the Senate and the House themselves the responsibility of their acceptance or their rejection.

Under him is Mr. Newell, a graduate of the Boston School of Technology, a man who entered the service when he was very young, an enthusiast on the subject of irrigation, and who during fourteen years' patient investigation and patient work has been preparing for this great work of construction. Those are the two men upon whom the responsibility for this work centered.

Now, what did they do? Select commissions to divide responsibility as to administration? Not at all. They drew into the force gradually the men who had distinguished themselves all over the country as topographers, as hydrographers, as hydraulic engineers, as constructing engineers, and the result is that today we have in the employment of that service a number of scientific men of large practical experience, a body that is unsurpassed by that in the employ of any other government in the world.

Now, let me say right here that it seems to me that the Panama Canal involves the same problems that are involved in the construction of irrigation works. You may call it a simple problem as compared with the construction of all the irrigation works that are contemplated in this country. The work of investigation and planning now embraces fourteen States in this Union. The topography of the country has been studied, stream measurements have been made, surveys of canals and ditches have been made, dams have been planned, reservoirs have been provided for, and they are almost ready for construction, and some are already commenced, and some have been finished. The Panama Canal involves the same work. What have you there? A line only 47 miles long. The irrigation work embraces the entire arid region, consisting of thirteen States and three Territories. The canal is 47 miles long. As you proceed from Colon, the canal runs through a flat country for 15 or 16 miles, the Government availing itself for a part of that distance of the Chagres River as a part of the canal. Then comes the Bohio dam, 80 feet above the surface of the land, and about 150 feet down to bed rock. Then you have this artificial lake as the result of the dam, which is to receive the flood waters of the Chagres and hold them, so that they will not tear the banks of the canal below.

Then we have the reservoir reenforced by other reservoirs upon the Chagres River, intended to control the violence of the stream. The Bohio reservoir is about 14 miles long. With 15 miles of the canal through the almost level plain to Bohio and the 14 miles of the Bohio reservoir you have a distance of 29 miles of the 47 miles completed. Then, farther to the south, you have the Culebra cut of about 10 miles, which is to be cut to a depth of from 66 to 80 feet, according to the number of locks employed. Then you have another level space, or almost level space, to the Pacific Ocean, about 8 miles, making in all about 47 miles.

Now, this service involves exactly the same problems on which the employees of the irrigation service have been engaged for fourteen years. It involves study of the geological formations, careful stream measurements through a series of years, so as to ascertain the extent of possible floods and prevent the destruction caused by such floods. It involves dam construction, ditch construction, and canal construction, just as in the arid region, and it involves protecting canals.

Now, let us see whether it would not have been wise for the President to have had a free hand to take hold of this scientific branch of the Government, which is an evolution of fourteen years, which had an administration already accomplished whose experience covered these various problems, instead of reaching out for a new administration, to be accomplished not by the aid of hydraulic engineers, but to be accomplished by the aid of railroad engineers inexperienced in hydraulic engineering.

The Bohio dam is about 80 feet high above the surface, though its foundation is to go down 150 feet to bed rock. Its length is 3,800 feet. That is a very long dam, of course, but at the Salt River in Arizona the United States Government is now constructing, under the reclamation service, a dam 270 feet high and 800 feet in length. It is also constructing the Shoshone dam, 310 feet high, with a length of 200 feet. It is constructing the Rio Grande dam, 255 feet high, with a length of 1,150 feet. That dam is to be constructed at a total cost of $5,115,000, whilst the Bohio dam at Panama will cost about $6,000,000.

Now, I ask, would it not have been better to have intrusted this work to that branch of the Government which has been built up through the slow process of evolution and which has now in its corps, either by direct appointment or as consulting engineer, every man in the country who has distinguished himself in hydraulic engineering.

Then as to tunnels. The irrigation service is now constructing the Gunnison tunnel, of a length of 6 miles—a tunnel 10 by 12 feet—and of that tunnel a mile is already completed. Recollect that the irrigation act was passed almost in the same month that the Panama act was passed. The irrigation committees of the Senate and the House visited the various projects during the last summer, and we had opportunity of observing the quickness and extent of the work, and we were amazed at the progress that had been made in the short space of three years.

At the same session of Congress a bill was passed for the construction of a post-office building, to cost fifty or sixty thousand dollars, in the city of Reno, Nev. That building is not yet constructed—the foundations are not yet laid; and yet the Reclamation Service has during the intervening period expended over $2,000,000 in reclamation work in Nevada; has diverted the Truckee River, a stream of floods during certain seasons of the year, a distance of 30 miles by a new river over into the Carson Valley; has constructed dams and locks and all the hydraulic machinery that was necessary to make that enterprise effective, and the water is now being turned out upon the soil.

Now, what salaries are paid these men? Mr. Walcott receives $6,000 a year. He could, in my judgment, because of the value of his services as an administrator, get a very much larger sum in outside employment, but he feels, as I observe most Government employees do, and particularly those relating to the scientific branches of the Government, a personal pride in his work. The commercial spirit does not entirely possess the men who are in the employ of the Geological Survey. They are content with reasonable compensation, and you could not tempt them from Government employ by the offer of larger compensation.

I know one distinguished engineer who has been employed in the great private enterprises of the West in irrigation construction who accepted from the United States Government a salary about one-third that which he earned in private practice, and he accepted it because he wished to identify his name with a great engineering work in which he was interested. The esprit de corps of this particular branch of the service is most marvelous. We men of the West have had opportunities of observing it. We have every year in the West an irrigation congress, composed of about a thousand men, deriving its membership from each one of the arid and semiarid States. The last congress I attended was in El Paso. The one previous to that was at Ogden. This convention of a thousand men was attended also by the engineers and hydrographers and the expert men of the Reclamation Service. They have annually a congress of their own, in which these engineers, coming from various parts of the country and engaged in different projects, present to the judgment of their associates in the congress their several projects, invite criticism, and ask judgment. To these conferences members of the irrigation congress were invited, and the result is they have been a great educational power in the West. Forty or fifty delegates from every State who attend that congress go back to their States familiar with the plans of the Government. They become informed through these expositions that take place and they form an educational force in every State, and, so far as the engineers are concerned, they feel the sustaining power of the people themselves in that great work.

Now, this demonstrates that the Government can get men for much less compensation than obtains in commercial life. Mr. Walcott gets $6,000 a year; Mr. Newell gets $5,000, and he is chief engineer, and no one of the noted engineers under him gets, I believe, more than $4,000 or $4,500. The salaries of the engineers range from $2,200 up to $4,500. The only exception is Mr. Grunsky, formerly of the Canal Commission, who has been assigned by the President to the position of consulting engineer, at a salary of $10,000 per annum.

It would have been very easy, simply by an extension of this service, to have taken the Panama Canal within the area of its work, involving exactly the same problems that this Bureau has been devoting itself to for fourteen years, and in which it has accumulated an experience that no set of men, however great their capacity, can acquire in a short time.

I do not question the ability of the engineers who have been employed in this work, but I do contend that almost all of them—I may say all that have been brought to my attention—have been engaged in railroad construction and not in hydraulic construction. Railway engineering is comparatively easy. It consists simply in surveys of the right of way, in adopting a certain standard of grade, in constructing tunnels and bridges across streams, whereas hydraulic engineering, as conducted in the West, involves not only those things, but many other things, and involves all the things that are embraced in the construction of the Panama Canal, except possibly the question of sanitation.

Now, let me show what the reclamation service has done during these three years. It has built 77 miles of main canals. These main canals have the size of rivers. You would be amazed at the magnitude of some of those works. It has built 50 miles of distributing canals. It has built 186 miles of irrigating ditches, 150 miles of telephone, 125 miles of road in canyons, involving deep rock cuts; 3½ miles of tunnels. It has excavated 10,000,000 cubic yards.

In one of their works, at the great Salt River dam, a dam which is to be constructed of cement and stone, they found they were held up by the cement trust. What did they do? They set their geologist to work, and the geologist discovered very near the site of the dam material admirably suited to make cement. And so they put up, at a cost of $100,000, a Portland cement mill, and there they are making cement at a great saving to the Government. I can not recall exactly the figures, but it is a very large sum.

Work is now going on in eleven different projects in as many different States, and they are now constructing the Shoshone dam, the Pathfinder dam, the Roosevelt dam, the Laguna dam, the Belle Fourche dam, the Gunnison tunnel (6 miles long), and 12 miles of ditches on the Colorado River.

So this service is moving along quietly, unobtrusively, in a businesslike way, under this system of individual responsibility. Mr. Newell, the chief engineer, is responsible to Mr. Walcott, the Director of the Geological Survey, and Mr. Walcott, the Director of the Geological Survey, is responsible to the Secretary of the Interior; and I believe that this work will be one of the crowning glories in the history of this Republic.

But even if the service of the irrigation survey should not be employed, even if its accumulated experience and information should not be tapped in this way in this work of identical character, it does seem to me that we should give the President of the United States a free hand, so that he can, if he chooses, turn over this work to the Geological Survey, or so that he can, if he chooses, adopt the system of individual responsibility to which I have referred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate as amended.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill making an appropriation to continue the construction of the isthmian canal, and for other purposes."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, December 18, 1905, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 16, 1905.

DISTRICT ATTORNEYS.

Thomas Lee Moore, of Virginia, to be United States attorney for the western district of Virginia. A reappointment, his term expiring January 31, 1906.

Harry Skinner, of North Carolina, to be United States attorney for the eastern district of North Carolina. A reappointment, his term expiring January 31, 1906.

COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

William H. Devos, of Wisconsin, to be collector of customs for the district of Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin. (Reappointment.)

Gad Smith, of Michigan, to be collector of customs for the district of Superior, in the State of Michigan. (Reappointment.)

William W. Sewall, of Maine, to be collector of customs for the district of Aroostook, in the State of Maine, to succeed Thomas H. Phair, whose term of office will expire by limitation December 19, 1905.

SURVEYOR OF CUSTOMS.

Edward F. Woodward, of California, to be surveyor of customs in the district of San Francisco, in the State of California, to succeed Joseph S. Spear, jr., whose term of office will expire by limitation December 19, 1905.

REGISTER OF LAND OFFICE.

Zenas Y. Coleman, of North Kakima, Wash., to be register of the land office at North Yakima, Wash., vice Henry V. Hinman, deceased.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

Lieut. (Junior Grade) John G. Church to be a lieutenant in the Navy from the 1st day of July, 1905, vice Lieut. Albert L. Norton, promoted.

Gunner William J. Foley to be a chief gunner in the Navy from the 10th day of April, 1905, upon the completion of six years' service, in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress approved April 27, 1904.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Quartermaster's Department.

Maj. Robert R. Stevens, quartermaster, to be deputy quartermaster-general with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, from December 15, 1905, vice Martin, retired from active service.

Capt. Richmond McA. Schofield, quartermaster, to be quartermaster with the rank of major, from December 15, 1905, vice Stevens, promoted.

POSTMASTERS.

ARIZONA.

Hugh M. Watson to be postmaster at Clifton, in the county of Graham and Territory of Arizona, in place of Arthur J. Hudson, resigned.

ALABAMA.

George W. Griffin to be postmaster at Tuskegee, in the county of Macon and State of Alabama, in place of John S. Webb, removed.

James B. Washington to be postmaster at Tuskegee Institute, in the county of Macon and State of Alabama. Office became Presidential October 1, 1905.

CALIFORNIA.

Norman Ashcroft to be postmaster at Hollywood, in the county of Los Angeles and State of California, in place of Herve Friend, resigned.

James G. Ferguson to be postmaster at Clovis, in the county of Fresno and State of California. Office became Presidential October 1, 1905.

George W. Humphreys to be postmaster at Dunsmuir, in the county of Siskiyou and State of California, in place of George W. Humphreys. Incumbent's commission expired March 2, 1905.

James T. Negley to be postmaster at Alturas, in the county of Modoc and State of California, in place of Sarah Laird, removed.

GEORGIA.

W. Y. Atkinson to be postmaster at Newnan, in the county of Coweta and State of Georgia, in place of Robert F. Milner. Incumbent's commission expires January 28, 1906.

John W. Bohanon to be postmaster at Eastman, in the county of Dodge and State of Georgia, in place of William S. Waite, removed.

John M. Duff to be postmaster at Tifton, in the county of Tift and State of Georgia, in place of John M. Duff. Incumbent's commission expires January 20, 1906.

ILLINOIS.

Fred A. Busse to be postmaster at Chicago, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, in place of Fred E. Coyne. Incumbent's commission expired December 11, 1905.

John F. Donovan to be postmaster at Kinmundy, in the county of Marion and State of Illinois, in place of John F. Donovan. Incumbent's commission expires December 18, 1905.

Augustus H. Helple to be postmaster at Washington, in the county of Tazewell and State of Illinois, in place of Augustus H. Helple. Incumbent's commission expires December 18, 1905.

William W. Wagner to be postmaster at Hospital, in the county of Kankakee and State of Illinois, in place of Clarence E. Holt, removed.

INDIANA.

Fletcher W. Boyd to be postmaster at Covington, in the county of Fountain and State of Indiana, in place of Fletcher W. Boyd. Incumbent's commission expired December 12, 1905.

John J. Brown to be postmaster at Rockport, in the county of Spencer and State of Indiana, in place of Elias E. Wesseler. Incumbent's commission expired December 12, 1905.

Calvin F. Brown to be postmaster at Pendleton, in the county of Madison and State of Indiana, in place of Calvin F. Brown. Incumbent's commission expired December 12, 1905.

Weldon A. Finch to be postmaster at Elwood, in the county of Madison and State of Indiana, in place of Weldon A. Finch. Incumbent's commission expired December 12, 1905.

Robert P. Grimes to be postmaster at Anderson, in the county of Madison and State of Indiana, in place of Robert P. Grimes. Incumbent's commission expired December 12, 1905.

William W. Kennedy to be postmaster at Martinsville, in the county of Morgan and State of Indiana, in place of Alfred M. Bain. Incumbent's commission expired December 12, 1905.

HOLIDAY ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back the accompanying concurrent resolution favorably.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution No. 12.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Thursday, December 21, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian Thursday, January 4, 1906.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 71. An act requiring the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to prepare a report upon the improvement of the Anacostia River flats.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 48) to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1905, on the 20th day of said month.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 71. An act requiring the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to prepare a report upon the improvement of the Anacostia River flats—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REFERENCE OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House resolution No. 42, Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania in the chair.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address myself directly to the proposition that is immediately before the House for consideration, which, as I understand it, is, To what standing committee of this House should we refer that part of the President's message dealing with insurance? Before I proceed, however, I want to offer a few observations on the question of national supervision, as opposed to State supervision, which has been suggested to my mind mainly by the argument made by the gentleman from Kentucky. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the argument made by the gentleman from Kentucky is the most logical and concise of any that I have ever listened to in favor of State regulation as against national regulation. Notwithstanding that, however, I am still firmly of the opinion that Congress should have the power to regulate life insurance. As to whether it does have jurisdiction I confess I have great doubt in my mind. The gentleman referred with a great deal of eloquence to what he called the ancient landmarks, defining the difference between State and national control. I presume, Mr. Chairman, that at the time our Constitution was framed no one of our forefathers had the remotest idea that insurance would assume the great importance that it has assumed in recent years. At that time I presume there was no one who had the remotest idea, or who could have possibly conceived, that insurance would spread away beyond the bounds of State control and would assume the proportions that it has assumed at the present time. I can remember the time when a man who had his life insured was a curiosity in the neighborhood where he resided, and he was supposed to be surrounded by a sort of halo of providential protection that was denied to the ordinary citizen. The time has come that a man who does not have his life insured, unless he is prevented from securing such insurance by some physical disability, is almost a curiosity. Life insurance, to which I refer, has spread and taken within its folds all the civilized world. It reaches out its helping hand to millions of beneficiaries all over civilization. It carries succor to the humble home after the hand which had provided for it is cold and helpless. It carries comfort and peace to the fireside of the poor and needy. It drives the wolf from the door of those who hunger. It carries assistance and support to the widow and fatherless and clothes with the mantle of protection the trembling form of the innocent child. Those who have charge of insurance moneys are charged with a duty not only to the State, but to all humanity. The man who misappropriates those sacred funds not only commits an offense against the law of the land, but he steals from the dead and robs the unborn child of its lawful inheritance. It is a subject, therefore, in which not only all people are interested, but one which should be guarded and protected by the strong arm of the law in order that its beneficent influences may be felt to the widest extent possible.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] must remember, and he can not help but observe, that all of the evils that have been disclosed by the recent insurance investigation, and which have been so eloquently pictured here on the floor of the House by those who have preceded me, all came about in every instance by the violation of State law. Every failure to carry out the sacred trust—every one of them—has come about under State regulation of insurance. There is no instance to which we have been cited, there is no occurrence that has been developed by this investigation, but what discloses truly and forcefully that, so far in our history, State regulation of insurance has been a failure. But, Mr. Chairman, there are other reasons than this why we should try some other remedy. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] very truthfully said that that people were governed best who were governed least. It is true, Mr. Chairman, but to my mind it is an argument in favor of national supervision rather than State supervision.

Why, sir, insurance companies have been governed by the laws of more than forty States. There has been too much government of insurance, none of which has been effective. I do not mean to say, Mr. Chairman, that if we had national supervision of insurance everything would be always right. I do not claim that that would make men pure. There would be crime, and there would be disregard of duty then. There has always been, and I presume there always will be, in this world men who commit crime, men who will violate the trust that is placed in them by their fellow-men. Yea, it has been true of heaven itself. We are told in Holy Writ that the devil was once an angel in good standing in the holy city. If he had committed no crime or done no wrong, I presume he would be there yet, and as a result we would have no hell to frighten us into the path of duty. But, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that all of these different States, passing different laws in regard to the regulation of something in which all of the people have a common interest, is one of the great arguments why we should have national supervision and a law of Congress that would control alike all insurance companies in all of the States in the Union.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not only our duty to legislate, if we can constitutionally do so, for the benefit of the insured, but we ought to protect all honest insurance companies. There is no conflict of interest between the people who hold policies of insurance and the insurance companies themselves, provided the companies are honestly and rightfully administered. We ought to protect insurance companies as well as the insured. We ought to protect all honest endeavors to carry out, in the best of faith, the best kind of insurance. Under present conditions insurance companies are subjected to all of the different laws of all of the different States of the Union. One State will require one condition before it will admit a company to do business within its limits. Another State will require an entirely different condition, and it is possible for one State to require some thing or condition for admittance within its borders that another State may regard as an absolute bar to admission into their State. So that the only way to get out of the controversy and avoid all of the difficulties that follow under the present regulation would be to give Congress the power to legislate.

Mr. Chairman, I believe as a rule people have a greater respect for the law of the nation than they do for the law of a State, and that men frequently violate laws of a State with impunity, but hesitate to violate the laws of the nation, where punishment is swifter and surer.

Mr. Chairman, there is a question that arises in my mind as to whether Congress has the constitutional right to pass any act that will be effective. And, coming now to the immediate question before the House, the question arises as to which committee we shall refer those parts of the President's message speaking of insurance. It is argued by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee that the only way we can reach insurance companies is by virtue of the taxing power of the Constitution. It is argued by the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee that the right way to reach it is to pass some act under that clause of the Constitution giving us control of interstate traffic.

It is argued by others that the only way we can reach it is to pass some law that will limit the use of the mails in the United States to insurance companies, and require them, as a condition for the use of the mails, that they shall comply with certain rules and regulations. Mr. Chairman, there is in all of these propositions a doubt expressed. The Supreme Court has emphatically said, in a unanimous decision, gentlemen, that insurance is not interstate commerce, and the only hope of those, as I understand it, who believe that we can regulate insurance by virtue of that clause of the Constitution is that the Supreme Court will reverse its decision. It seems to me that this is not a safe rule by which we ought to be guided in our legislation here. I doubt very much whether we could secure adequate regulation by virtue of the taxing power. I doubt very much whether we could secure adequate regulation by virtue of the rule requiring them to conform to our regulations before they are entitled to the use of the mails. Therefore, all through, gentlemen on one hand are claiming one thing and gentlemen on the other hand claiming another, but all agreeing that there is great doubt as to whether we have any jurisdiction, and if we have the jurisdiction under one or other of these parts of our Constitution whether it is sufficient to give us power to properly and adequately remedy the evils that recent investigation has disclosed now and for some time have existed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, has stated that it is the custom of the Speaker to refer to the different committees the various bills in accordance with the nature of the proposed legislation contained within the bills themselves, although some of the bills may contain provisions that would be proper to refer to another committee, yet that uniformly they are all referred to one committee having general jurisdiction of the subject. I believe that wherever we have a committee upon a given subject that the rule has always been adhered to; but you must bear in mind that this House has not a committee on insurance—another evidence of doubt as to our jurisdiction. Those who framed the rules undoubtedly thought the Congress had no jurisdiction of insurance.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] has shown us conclusively that it has been the custom to refer bills to different committees than the committee on the subject-matter, so that there is no reason on that ground that we should refer it to the Committee on Ways and Means. There is no reason on any of these grounds that we should refer it to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The same objection applies to referring it to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. All through there is a doubt; and there can be no question but what every man who has given the matter consideration, every lawyer who has investigated the subject, although he may himself have definite ideas on the question, is compelled to admit to himself that on account of the decisions of the Supreme Court he must at least doubt what would be the result of legislation along any of these lines.

There is another reason, Mr. Chairman, why we should not refer this matter to any of these committees, and that is that we do not want to commit ourselves to any particular line of policy. We want, as I understand it, to do that which will bring the most effective, righteous regulation of the insurance question; and we do not want to confine ourselves to the taxing power if we have any other power. We do not want to confine ourselves to the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution if there is a doubt about it, or any other power under the Constitution.

It seems to me the only way for this House to get out of this difficulty, and take away all possibility of doubt is to be advised by a committee whose duty and whose business it is to advise us on such subjects, and that we ought to refer the matter in the President's message in controversy to the Committee on the Judiciary. I submit, gentlemen, that that will do away with any idea of committing ourselves to any particular line of policy. It will give us information by a body of men qualified to judge as to just what our difficulties are in the premises. It may be found possible, after that investigation, that they will come to the conclusion that in order to get adequate jurisdiction to regulate the matter properly it will be necessary that an amendment to the Constitution of the United States should be adopted. I know that this is a difficult proposition ordinarily; but, Mr. Chairman, the people are aroused on this subject and I believe if the Congress of the United States, at the beginning of this session should pass a proper amendment it would be ratified by enough States to make it a law before this Congress adjourns. So that before our adjournment we could properly legislate and properly act to give relief to a suffering people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, every one, as I stated, who has considered this matter has had a doubt. Let us read what the President has said in regard to it; what he has so courageously and ably stated in his message. I find he quotes with approval what he said in a former message to Congress:

> I said in my last annual message I recommended that Congress carefully consider whether the power of the Bureau of Corporations could constitutionally be extended to cover the case of transactions in insurance.

Further along, in summing up his able argument, he recommends that—

> Congress should carefully consider whether further legislation can be had.

He is not committed to any particular line of policy that he wants us to follow. He is not committed to the one idea of giving the Bureau of Corporations additional power on this subject, but in every line he has submitted you will find that he wants effective legislation on this subject without regard to the particular executive branch whose duty it shall be made to enforce the law. Through all his argument, however, it is clearly to be seen that he has a doubt as to just what jurisdiction we have or whether in fact we have any.

He wants us to "consider" whether we have power to enact any further legislation on this subject. That is the question he has submitted to us. That is the question that we are going to refer and to which we want an answer. Now, where is it to be referred?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I desire to ask a question or two, and I will preface my question with the statement that I do not altogether agree with the gentleman in relation to the functions of the Committee on the Judiciary. I understand that committee simply has charge of matters pertaining to the judicial branch of the Government, and that it is no more the duty of that committee to instruct us upon constitutional questions than it is our duty to instruct it. Now, suppose the subject of insurance should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that committee should decide that there is no power in Congress to regulate the subject of insurance under the commerce provision of the Federal Constitution. Would the gentleman expect that decision to conclude the balance of the Members of the House?

Mr. NORRIS. Not necessarily.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then what is the use of sending it to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. NORRIS. Because we have to send it to some committee. I will admit, if the gentleman please, that when the committee report we will then have its report before us for action and determination, but it is through the instrumentality of sending it to that committee that we can rightfully consider the question here. We would not be bound by the report of the committee, although we might be influenced a great deal by the mature deliberation of the members of that committee.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, one other question. If it be the judgment of Congress that the Federal Government ought to have power to regulate the subject of insurance under the commerce clause of the Constitution, and if there still be some doubt about the existence of that power, would it not be better to enact a proper law and have it go to the final tribunal of arbitrament, the Supreme Court of the United States, finally to determine whether that power does exist, and then the country would be in shape to know whether the Constitution needs amendment in that respect?

Mr. NORRIS. In answer to the gentleman's question I will say that I do not believe that that would be the proper course to pursue, and I will briefly give my reasons for my belief. If we refer it, as he says, to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and let them enact a law and then let that go through all the details of traveling up through the different courts until it reaches the Supreme Court and a decision is finally rendered, we have lost several years of time, and the difficulty is going on all the while. Then there is another reason. The Supreme Court has already decided the matter, and the only hope is that the Supreme Court will reverse itself. So if that is the policy that we should pursue in such cases, and we should always adopt the same rule, we should never reach a conclusion. Why, sir, if it went to the Supreme Court and that court sustained its former decision, which I believe it would do, and the question came back again to us, the same argument would be good then as now, and gentlemen could argue, "Let us pass another bill and give the Supreme Court another chance to reverse itself."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. One other question. I agree with the gentleman in the view that the question seems to have been definitely settled by the Supreme Court of the United States; but in view of the changed character of insurance now as compared to what it was in the time that the case of Paul v. Virginia was decided it may be that the court would take a different view of it. But I want to correct the suggestion that the gentleman made that I favor referring the subject to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I am opposed to referring it to any committee, and would allow the Speaker a free hand to refer bills to the different committees according to their character. That is my attitude.

Mr. NORRIS. If the gentleman will pardon me, as far as referring the bills with a free hand by the Speaker is concerned, that is what I want, and referring this to the Judiciary Committee will in no sense be an instruction to the Speaker that he shall refer insurance bills to the Judiciary Committee. Not by any means; but, on the other hand, if it was referred to some other committee it might be taken by the Speaker as the opinion of this House that he should refer all bills to such committee.

In further reply to the gentleman from Indiana, I want to say that one of the reasons why I advocate the reference of this matter in the President's message to the Judiciary Committee is that we may not at this time go on record ourselves as to just what committee shall have the proper jurisdiction. We are called upon to answer a legal question. It ought to go to the committee having jurisdiction of such matters.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I will.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I do not wish to embarrass the gentleman in his remarks, because I consider that he is making a very good argument on this question, and has given it considerable thought; but if he will permit me just a moment, I should like to ask a question, but in doing so would like to repeat some things that have been said.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; I gladly yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yesterday and the day before, during the discussion of this matter—and I consider that the House has exceeded the rules in so doing—the President and his message have been drawn into the discussion. There seems to be a difference of opinion as to what the President intended. And now the gentleman himself, in discussing it, is trying to make plain, if possible, what the President did intend in his message. The gentleman also stated in the beginning that he wished to confine himself strictly to the question at issue, and that apparently is to what appropriate committee shall this question be consigned. Now, I wish to read a portion of section 2 of Rule XXIV of this House.

Messages from the President shall be referred to the appropriate committees without debate.

I would like to ask the gentleman how he will interpret that, and if, in view of that rule, the two or three days of discussion, which has taken the form of debate upon the meaning of the message itself, is proper. Should not the matter be left to the Speaker of this House to refer it to what he considers the proper committees, without debate, and especially without debate upon what is contained in the message?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman's inquiry I want to say, in the first place, that if we have been violating the rule of the House I am not to blame for that; the discussion, if the gentleman's contention be true, is going on regardless of that rule. It has nothing to do, as I look at it, with the question now before us; but I believe there is no violation of that rule. The President's message was referred without debate; it was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and this committee is trying to subdivide it and refer it to different appropriate committees under a special resolution that has been introduced.

Now, I do not care to discuss that proposition, because, as I look at it, it is immaterial now whether we are violating a rule or not. It is a question that might come up in a different way, but I do not see how it can affect us here at the present time. We are discussing it, we have discussed it, even if there is a rule against it, and if it be true that we are violating a rule we are in the position of the man in jail whose lawyer said that they could not put him in jail for the alleged offense, but he found himself there just the same.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. If the gentleman will pardon me just a moment, I think the gentleman is in error in that he says we are following the rule strictly, because it has been referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The language of this portion of the rule I have referred to is peculiar: "Messages from the President shall be referred to appropriate committees without debate." You are attempting to refer it to appropriate committees, and I should judge you were debating some of the substance of the President's message, as, for instance, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] particularly debated and drew some just and some unjust criticisms upon that message. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], in an elaborate and eloquent speech, did the same. The gentleman from Nebraska is trying to give his version of the President's message, and to my mind it is a distinct violation of this rule.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not understand that that can make any difference even if it is a violation; but I do not believe it is a violation of the rule. We are now in a committee; we are now a committee. This is not the House, but the Committee of the Whole House. It has been "appropriately" referred to this committee, and "without debate," and we are trying to refer from this committee to subcommittees the different portions of that message.

Now, I was not quite through with my answer to the gentleman from Indiana. He said he did not agree with me that it ought to go to the Judiciary Committee; that he did not think it was their duty. Now, Mr. Chairman, it may be that in these specific terms the duty under the rules of the Judiciary Committee is not defined in the way I have interpreted it, but it has been the custom of the House to refer questions of law to the Judiciary Committee, that has jurisdiction of legal matters, and when that committee reports it comes back to us and we then pass upon it, and pass upon it effectively. We must refer it to some committee. It can not reach a conclusion without some reference. We can not reach the judgment of this House in any other way. The proper course would be to let the Judiciary Committee investigate it and report to us in the light of their wisdom and ability.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said, it seems to me that the President himself, in his message, as clear as can be, expresses a doubt; every man who has had anything to do with that subject has expressed a doubt, and I believe if we want to get right we should refer the matter to the Judiciary Committee, and thus relieve ourselves of any position taken in favor of any particular line of legislation. I do not think we should take any particular line before that committee has properly investigated and passed upon the matter. I have incorporated in a motion, which I shall offer at the proper time, an instruction to the Judiciary Committee to report to us, giving their idea as to what jurisdiction, if any, we have upon the subject of insurance. And I want to give notice now that at the right time, when the place in the bill is reached, I shall offer that amendment. It strikes me, therefore, that we ought, if we agree with this idea, vote down every amendment that may be offered referring it to any other committee and adopt an amendment that shall refer it properly to the Committee on the Judiciary. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time, which I reserved yesterday, to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish, as briefly as possible, to call attention to the practical results of the assumption of control of insurance companies by the Federal Government. In the first place, I am firmly of the opinion that if the Federal Government takes jurisdiction of insurance companies it will multiply the evils that it means to cure, and instead of rendering these companies more liable to the law will grant them a practical immunity from the responsibility they are now attempting to shirk. In the first place, it is a rare and an unusual spectacle that the thief, caught red handed with his plunder about him, confessing his guilt almost without a blush, should himself suggest to us that the best means of punishing him is by placing him under Federal jurisdiction, where his punishment may be more speedy and more severe. No man knows better than the insurance company itself where the danger lies. Long experience has convinced us that no one knows better how to evade the law than they. The only hope that I entertain of ever seeing these predatory bands of organized marauders, who play like harpies upon the helpless and the dead, brought to justice is by the awakened energies of State legislatures and the awakened conscience of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You must remember that the assumption of Federal jurisdiction means the destruction of State control. It is inevitable. There is no lawyer upon either side of this Chamber who will question or doubt it. The ground upon which the Federal courts refuse to the State courts jurisdiction of common carriers is that the common carriers are engaged in interstate commerce. The principle upon which the Federal courts and the Supreme Court of the United States have again and again refused to take jurisdiction of insurance companies is that they are not engaged in interstate commerce and are not subject to Federal control. In the case of Hooper v. California and in the case of Crutcher v. Kentucky, one being the corollary of the other, this question is undoubtedly settled. Says Justice White, in the case of Hooper v. California:

> The principle that the right of a foreign corporation to engage in business in a State other than that of its creation depends solely upon the will of such other State has long been settled, and many phases of its application have been illustrated by the decisions of this court.
> While there are exceptions to this rule, they embrace only cases where a corporation created by one State rests its right to enter another and engage in business therein upon the Federal nature of its business, as, for instance, where it has derived its being from an act of Congress, and has become a lawful agency for the performance of governmental or quasi governmental functions or where it is necessarily an instrumentality of interstate commerce, or its business constitutes such commerce, it is therefore solely within the paramount authority of Congress.

In the case of Crutcher v. Kentucky, the legislature of Kentucky passed a law by which it forced express companies to give a bond with approved security that they had in assets subject to execution at least the sum of $150,000, for the protection of persons intrusting valuables in their charge, and in that case the Supreme Court of the United States held that they could not be forced to make any such disclosures to the State governments, nor could they be forced to give any such bond, because they were engaged in interstate commerce. Now, apply that rule to insurance companies, and every provision of every State legislature in the United States requiring insurance companies to deposit bonds or to give evidence of their solvency before doing business in the State must fall to the ground under the rule in Crutcher v. Kentucky the minute they become interstate carriers. The jurisdiction of Federal courts and of State courts are not concurrent. The assumption of jurisdiction by the Federal court is the death of the last vestige of authority by the State courts.

The evil is worse than that. The minute the Supreme Court of the United States treats insurance companies as common carriers every individual case between an insured and the insurer where the amount in controversy exceeds $2,000 can, upon a petition of the insurance company that it is a foreign corporation, be immediately transferred to a Federal court, just as damage suits against railroads are transferred to-day. My God! what a haven of rest and protection it will be to these people if they can not only prey upon you collectively but can, after you have paid these enormous premiums through all your life and at last, using your burden as a pillow you sink to sleep, come and answer your widow and your orphan with the statement that the contract was obtained through fraud, or some other invalid defense, and carry them helpless and penniless some 500 miles to a Federal court of their own wise selection. [Applause.]

The evil is more deep seated than that. I wish in all solemnity and in the deepest earnestness of my soul to sound a note of warning to every Democrat on this side of the House, and I say this in no partisan sense—I wish to sound a note of warning to every man upon either side of this House who believes in a government composed of an autonomy of sovereign States indissolubly bound.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. STANLEY. I ask for ten minutes, in order to conclude my remarks. I do not think I will need as much as that.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman be allowed ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. It is moved that the gentleman from Kentucky have ten minutes additional time to complete his remarks. Has any gentleman any objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STANLEY. I wish to say this to this House, that the greatest danger that menaces this Government, that ever menaced it from any source, is not from internecine strife or from foreign invasion. It is from the gradual and insidious assumption of unwarranted powers by the Federal judiciary. The founders of this Government wisely chose in balancing the executive, legislative, and judicial, one against the other, to avoid those rocks upon which all other ships of state had broken from the days of Pisistratus and the thirty tyrants until the revolution of 1688. There is no instance, so far as I know, in all history of the destruction of the liberties of the people by an autocratic government that has not arisen either from the executive having assumed the powers of the legislative or the legislative having assumed the powers of the executive. In order that the three coordinate branches of the Government might be safely, wisely, and perpetually balanced one against another, this Government tried an experiment which was in its form unique in all the history of the world. They placed the supreme authority, the right to check encroachments, the right to check the assumption of unwarranted powers, both on the part of the executive and on the part of the legislative, in the hands of the judiciary. In answering the question raised at the time as to the danger of giving this unusual and unprecedented power to the judiciary Alexander Hamilton used this language:

> This [i. e., the safety of delegating this power] may be inferred with certainty from the general nature of the judicial power, from the objects to which it relates, from the manner in which it is exercised, from its comparative weakness, and from its total incapacity to support its usurpations by force.

More than that, the high character of the judiciary, their freedom from the storms and tumult, the wild ambition that fires the blood of executives and of legislators, made it appear only the more safe. The founders of this Government assumed that the judiciary, secure for life in their serene retreats, with all the fairness, all the wisdom, all the placid composure that mark the august wearers of the ermine, might safely be made the monitors of the rulers of the nation; that they might stand both as censors and, if need be, as masters when the commanders of armies and when dignified legislatures assumed powers not lawfully their own. I want to show to you that the danger of giving to the judiciary this tremendous power escaped not the prophetic voice of him who has been pictured by the eloquent leader of this House as the wisest mere man who ever graced the earth. Even at that time, a hundred years ago and more, Thomas Jefferson saw the danger of the insidious undermining of the whole fabric of government by the assumption of unwarranted power on the part of the judiciary. He declared:

> I am sensible of the inroads daily making by the Federal into the jurisdiction of its coordinate associates, the State governments. The legislative and executive branches may sometimes err, but elections and dependence will bring them to rights. The judiciary branch is the instrument which, working like gravity, without intermission, is to press us at last into one consolidated mass.

Now, let us see what will be the effect of this. Suppose the Government takes control of insurance companies. It means that the Government shall take cognizance of an insurance contract. Now, I submit that a contract of insurance is among the simplest contracts ever made. It is simply an agreement by one party to indemnify another against loss in a given contingency. No contract of insurance need even to be in writing. It has nothing like the solemnity of a deed to 3 acres of land. It is a very complex affair, I know. It has been made complex by the red tape and the cunning of men who have made thievery a profession and plunder a business. [Applause.]

If the Federal Government can take cognizance of a simple contract of that kind because of the complexity of the contract, and not because in its nature it is interstate commerce, but because of the amount involved, then our liberties must decrease as our wealth accumulates. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If the Federal Government can take cognizance of a simple contract of insurance it can then take cognizance of any business and every business transacted between individuals or corporations in different States. It is the death knell of the old circuit court. It is the death knell of the rights controlled by juries of your peers of the vicinage. It is the destruction of that fabric, save as to the method of penitentiaring a few thieves who do not engage in interstate plunder. Our courts are gone. You had better a thousand times call the President of the United States an autocrat, and make him one; better a thousand times give to this body authority of which its founders never dreamed and keep intact your courts at home. Keep pure, undefiled, its jurisdiction unassailed, that court which takes congnizance of your liberty, your property and your life, than destroy the autonomy of the courts and preserve the tinsel of a free government and of a republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Assume this jurisdiction, destroy the last vestige of the autonomy of the State, give to the Federal Government the right at will to take cognizance of any contract made with any individuals of different States, and all business will immediately go into the Federal courts, because we are tied together to-day by a literal plexus of rail and wire. There is no business that is not interstate. Few, indeed, are they who are engaged in any business so small, so poor, that it does not extend beyond the boundaries of the Commonwealth in which it is conducted. Give them authority over insurance companies, and all business, all transactions, pass to the Federal courts, and to that court we all must go, poor and rich alike, with its costs and its delays. Take cognizance of insurance, with all its attendant evils, and I say to you that from that hour that fair and faultless fabric, that exqusite temple created and guarded by the wisdom, the patriotism, yea, the inspiration of Washington and Madison, Jefferson and Jay, is a myth and a memory. We may have a good Government—I pray God that we may have a free Government—but we cease to possess, we cease to enjoy, we cease to know that government founded by the wisdom, the courage, and the patriotism of our forefathers, and bequeathed by them as a priceless heritage to their posterity. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. YOUNG having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bill of the following title:

S. 410. An act to authorize the Rock Island, Arkansas and Louisiana Railroad Company to construct bridges across Ouachita River and other navigable rivers in the State of Arkansas.

DISTRIBUTION OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that it has been the custom of Chairmen in presiding over the Committee of the Whole to alternate between the two sides of the House. Inasmuch as one of the gentlemen on the right has been extremely obliging to his colleagues in affording time to speak, the Chairman will break the rule in this instance and recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, in the course of his remarks yesterday the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] gave as one reason why he might not favor the reference of that part of the President's message regarding insurance companies to the Committee on the Judiciary was that the chairman of that committee had not during this debate contended for jurisdiction over the subject. The spirited controversy that has occurred between the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means as to which of these committees should have this subject for consideration and the silence of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary furnish a very potent reason why this matter should go to the Committee on the Judiciary. As an unpretentious member of the latter committee, I might say that its chairman is not anxious to have to undertake the arduous duty of making a special investigation of the regulation of life insurance companies. It is well known to the Members of this House that the Committee on the Judiciary has, in the ordinary course of legislation, at every session of Congress to deal with many questions of constitutional law, and that it spends much time in study and discussion. Undoubtedly the chairman and the Committee on the Judiciary would examine into every phase of the so-called insurance question and report back to this House if such duty should be imposed upon that committee.

This debate on the President's message will prove to be helpful in the determination of public questions, and it also furnishes substantial evidence that the Members of the House have not forgotten the limitations of the Federal Government, and that they have not been unmindful of the responsibility imposed by their oaths to support the Constitution of the United States. Good thought and excellent arguments have been adduced. In this connection it might be invidious to point out the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and his colleague [Mr. STANLEY], the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. They all made valuable contributions to a correct exposition of our scheme of government. Renewed attention has been called to the fact that we have a dual system of government, State and Federal, each independent and powerful in its own sphere, but utterly without authority when it undertakes to trespass upon the domain of the other. The Federal Government is vested with delegated powers, and every power not specially granted or fairly and necessarily implied for the exercise of a power granted is reserved to the States or to the people. So anxious were the fathers to emphasize this interpretation that they deemed it wise to embody it in the tenth amendment. We are compelled to ask ourselves what authority has the Federal Government for the regulation of insurance business. The highest court in the land has declared that such business is not interstate commerce. The ingenious argument is made that the taxing power furnishes a peg upon which to hang Federal jurisdiction. No Democrat ought to subscribe to that doctrine. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Federal Government has ample power to tax for revenue for the maintenance of the Government honestly and economically administered, but it can not rightfully and it ought not, as a mere pretext to conceal an unauthorized ulterior design, resort to the subterfuge of putting into the body of a measure which would otherwise certainly be held unconstitutional a provision for taxation for the purpose of conferring some sort of doubtful jurisdiction where otherwise there would clearly be no jurisdiction on the part of the Federal Government.

Mr. Chairman, as important as the regulation and control of insurance companies may be, we can console ourselves with the reflection that there resides power in the State to punish those who steal from the policy holders, to punish those who are intrusted with a great fund for the maladministration of their trust. These companies, the creatures of the State, are amenable to State laws, to home rule. And, further, it may be said that the public who deal with them can rebuke their conduct by withholding future business and by patronizing those who are honest and correct in their dealings and administrations. Already it seems that the State of New York has investigated and exposed the rascality practiced in the administration of the three greatest life insurance companies in the United States. The offending officials have been held up to public contempt, have been driven from their places of power, honest men have been put in control of the affairs of the companies, and we are not without hope that further punishment will be visited upon the offenders.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to indulge in any extended remarks about that feature of the President's message which refers to insurance companies. While the message is before us for consideration I desire within the hour which belongs to me under the rule of the House to discuss what I consider and the country believes to be a more important and urgent question, and one of which the Federal Government has undoubted jurisdiction, and one which has been urged upon the attention of Congress year after year—the regulation of the public carriers of the country engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. Chairman, public thought upon the question of Federal regulation of the great corporations engaged in interstate transportation has been divided. There are those who believe that the great transportation companies should be at perfect liberty to conduct their traffic without any regulation by Federal or State government. They indulge in the erroneous assumption that the business of these quasi-public corporations is analogous to that of a storekeeper or an individual engaged in some private enterprise. Those who entertain such thought are for the most part the railroad magnates and those who have allied interests. They are forgetful that these corporations are given extraordinary power, and that this power is given to them because of the service they owe to the public. These corporations may by condemnation proceedings take the land upon which the home of the citizen is situated—aye, more than that—they may even condemn for their purposes a cemetery where sleeps in sacred dust one's kin, or departed citizens of great renown. No individual, for the exploitation of any private enterprise, can exercise or invoke the exercise of such power. It is needless to dwell upon the many features that render these corporations the servants of the public and not the masters of the people. And, Mr. Chairman, there is another class, perhaps not very large, who believe that the Government should own and operate the great transportation companies. They seem to be unmindful of the fact that this would be of most doubtful authority; a most stupenduous undertaking, and one the administration of which would be most preplexing if not disastrous to the Government and to the people.

The ownership of 212,000 miles of railroad, to say nothing of the millions for equipment and maintenance, would cost more than $14,000,000,000. The Government could not purchase these railroads except by issuing bonds, and such a bond issue would amount to a monstrous interest-bearing public indebtedness necessarily perpetual—an indebtedness that could never be paid. The great multimillionaires would then have an ideal scheme upon which to build up and perpetuate from generation to generation a plutocracy—an aristocracy founded upon inherited and transmitted everlasting interest bearing public indebtedness. Such an aristocracy would be more hateful than that which the fathers sought, by the abolishment of the law of primogeniture, to forever exclude from American soil. Besides, the scheme would nullify some of the most salutary laws of the States. There would be no more separate-coach statutes, which have proven in the South of so much benefit to the safety, convenience, and peace of the races. The evils wrought by the carpetbaggers of the reconstruction period would perhaps be excelled in enormity by the evil practices of carpetbag Federal railroad officials. But I must hasten on with the remarks that I wish to make in regard to proposed legislation. There is another division in the public thought. There are those, and I believe they constitute a majority of the American people, who believe that the Government of the United States ought to and must control by regulations the corporations engaged in interstate traffic. To this class and to those who entertain this view I believe a majority of the Members of this House belong. On several occasions in the past Congresses during my service here and before many of us became actors here the Members of the House have voted with practical unanimity for regulation of these transportation companies. The authority of Congress to enact such legislation as will effectually regulate and control such corporations is undoubted.

To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes is not only the power of Congress but one of its highest duties, and one now more urgent and pressing than at any period in the history of our country. In view of the public utterances of the President, and the fact that he has put his hand into the shirt collar of his party, particularly that part of it which sits in this House, and I hope that part of it which sits at the other end of the Capitol, and dragged it up by the force of his great personality to the advocacy of remedial legislation, I may now, without being accused of partisanship, congratulate the Republican party upon what I believe, or hope at least, is its determination to obey the popular demand. I may also refer to the attitude of the Democratic party. In 1896, after decisions of the Supreme Court emasculating the interstate-commerce law of 1887, the Democratic party took prompt and decisive position upon the interstate-transportation question, and suggested specifically the medium through which these corporations should be regulated or controlled. The Democratic platform of 1896 was in these words:

> The absorption of wealth by the few, the consolidation of our leading railroad systems, and the formation of trusts and pools require a stricter control by the Federal Government of those arteries of commerce. We demand the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and such restrictions and guaranties in the control of railroads as will protect the people from robbery and oppression.

And again four years later, in 1900, the Democratic platform was in these words:

> We favor such an enlargement of the scope of the interstate-commerce law as will enable the Commission to protect individuals and communities from discriminations and the public from unjust and unfair transportation rates.

And last year, 1904, the Democratic platform was in the following language:

> A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. Individual equality of opportunity and free competition are essential to a healthy and permanent commercial prosperity, and any trust, combination, or monopoly tending to destroy these by controlling production, restricting competition, or fixing prices and wages should be prohibited and punished by law. We especially denounce rebates and discriminations by transportation companies as the most potent agency in promoting and strengthening these unlawful conspiracies against trade.
> We demand an enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the end that the traveling public and shippers of this country may have prompt and adequate relief from the abuses to which they are subjected in the matter of transportation. We demand a strict enforcement of existing civil and criminal statutes against all such trusts, combinations, and monopolies; and we demand the enactment of such further legislation as may be necessary effectually to suppress them.

So, Mr. Chairman, it may be said in truth that the great historic party to which I owe allegiance has been consistent, insistent, and persistent in its demand that power be conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to the end that these great corporations may be bridled, regulated, or controlled, with due, lawful, and proper recognition of the rights of the people who are compelled to pay the toll. I am led to make these remarks because one hears on every side of the President's position in favor of conferring these additional powers on the Interstate Commerce Commission. Such position on his part is creditable to him, but it was the position of the Democratic party long before he appeared in the national arena. In no platform of any national Republican convention has demand ever been made for conferring additional powers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, and even in the late platform of the Republican party of the State of Ohio, that of 1905, the Republican party ran away from this position. That convention, presided over by Judge Taft, a member of the President's official family, refused to recommend such a remedy. They knew that the development of our country and the combination of the railroads have been such that in the railroad traffic we can no longer say competition is the life of trade, for there is no competition. That has been destroyed. Practically all the railroads of the country are now in the hands and under the control of six great combinations, who are in turn controlled by perhaps half a dozen multimillionaires. After competing lines have been absorbed there is no competition with which to fight onerous exactions or unjust discriminations or other evil practices——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Oh, I have not very long to speak.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, I only want to ask a question.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have not many minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Would it not be the necessary result of a systematic fixing of rates by a board that all competition is thereby destroyed?

Mr. CLAYTON. Competition has been destroyed by agreements and combinations. I am not sure that I understand the gentleman's question. The proposition that I apprehend will be brought before Congress is that Congress shall declare that interstate transportation rates shall be just and reasonable and that discrimatory practices and special privileges to particular shippers shall be unlawful, and in any given case complaint may be made to the Interstate Commerce Commission that provisions of this legislative standard have been violated, and that the Commission may then hear the case and if the complaint is sustained order that the unlawful practice shall cease, and that it may then fix a substitute rate reasonable and just or forbid the practice complained of, and that such order and decree shall become operative at once and shall remain in force and effect until set aside by the courts, if the court should ultimately decide the findings in the case to be unlawful. [Applause.]

It is proposed to give to the Commission the power to substitute a reasonable rate and a just practice for an unreasonable rate and an unjust practice.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes.

Mr. STANLEY. Even if the enlarging of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission should destroy competition, is it not better that competition between railroad companies should be destroyed by the Interstate Commerce Commission fixing a rate that is reasonable than by their destroying competition themselves by fixing a rate that is extortionate? [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Undoubtedly. And yet we hear it said in this day and time that Congress ought not to control the railroads—ought not to enforce its power of control over them. Well, Congress has this power specifically confided to it in the commerce clause, and shall Congress in this day, when evils are complained of on every hand and of unjust practices, of discriminatory wrongs, of unreasonable exactions—shall Congress abdicate its power to control these gigantic corporations and let the corporations control themselves and a helpless public? [Applause.] The power and duty to regulate these railroads has been imposed upon Congress by the Constitution, and we can not rightfully surrender this power of regulation to the railroads.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Especially when the States have no power.

Mr. CLAYTON. The States have no power over interstate commerce, but they have the power to control them in local traffic, and some of the States have done that and other States are doing it more and more. I am glad that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] interrupted me a few minutes ago. I want to again advert to the fact that the last Republican platform in the State of Ohio this year ran away from the proposition to confer this additional power upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] That great party which has boasted of its courage was too cowardly in the State of Ohio when it came to write its last platform to stand up and declare for enlarged powers to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to interrupt?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. After the Republican party in Ohio had run away from that question, did not the Republican voters in Ohio run away from the party? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CLAYTON. They seem to have, and seem to have elected a Democratic governor.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The only candidate upon the Republican ticket in Ohio this year who boldly spoke in favor of the proposition the gentleman is advocating was beaten by 40,000, while every man who did not do it was elected by over 40,000.

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, he was advocating a virtue and he must have had a very bad record. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] And the great Secretary of War, Mr. Taft, did not advocate in his speech before that convention this specific remedy, and the great Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] has never advocated it. Read his long controversy with one of the shipping associations at Cincinnati on this subject and read the bill that he has introduced during this session at the other end of the Capitol. He wants some sort of doubtful compromise machinery or court somewhere in the effort to delude, misguide, and fool the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This determination to give larger powers to the Interstate Commerce Commission since the act of 1887 was emasculated has been contended for in every Democratic convention, and when we pass an effectual act, a Democratic act by the aid of Republican votes, an act which is approved by the Republican President, who on that proposition is Democratic, we on this side of the aisle can joint in your congratulation. You Republicans have sometimes accused the Democrats of camping this year where you camped last year. In this matter you can not deny that your President is camping and is trying to make his party camp where the Democratic party has been camping from 1896 down to this good hour. [Applause.]

We can congratulate the country and the Republican party for coming to our position. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You have come to our position. Now do not run away from it; stand up to your President. We are going to stand by him. He is maintaining our doctrine, and we are going to uphold his hands. We are going to help him put these laws upon the statute books, if he and his party be as brave as he promises. Do not bring here from your committee, and I appeal to you, some other new court, some other new machinery, some other long and windy measure—doubtful and requiring judicial construction. Take some of these simple propositions offered by the gentleman from Mississippi or by the gentleman from New York, or any good, simple bill offered by any Member, and report it to this House. Give whatever name you please to it. This is one time when if a measure of that sort comes here branded the "Grosvenor bill" or the "Hepburn bill" or with any other name we will vote for it cheerfully. We will be glad to help you put it through, but do not arrogate to yourselves all the virtue of such legislation. You came to our position. Why? Your President knew. He was wiser than most of you on that side. The President has recognized the fact, I think, in some of his public utterances that the time has come in this country when you must choose between government control and government ownership. The President has taken the Democratic position of government control under the ample power of the Constitution without resorting to any doubtful power of the Federal Government.

Mr. Chairman, the country is to be congratulated upon what I hope is about to happen in Congress. Let academic discussions that are indulged in by champions of the great corporations against this proposed legislation now be relegated to the past. Congress undoubtedly has the power to regulate to the full extent now demanded by the public the corporations engaged in transportation between the States and with foreign countries. The State governments have ample authority under their reserved powers to deal with questions and evils of intrastate or local nature. Many of the States have exercised and are now exercising to their rightful extent under their own appropriate State legislation the regulation of local traffic and local rates, and those States that have not exercised such power have this duty resting upon them. The power of the State to legislate is without limit except the limitations imposed by the Federal Constitution or the State constitution.

It will be remembered that the interstate-commerce law was passed in 1887. For ten years the railroads or transportation companies of the country yielded respect to that law. They obeyed almost without exception during those ten years the mandates of the Interstate Commerce Commission; but since 1896, when that law was emasculated by the decisions of the courts, they have defied the Commission. During the time of their acquiescence in the act of 1887, the through or interstate rates of the country were regulated by the Commission and for the most part accepted by the transportation companies, and the tendency was then to make railroad rates lower and lower, but since that act was impaired by the courts the tendency has been to make the rates more unreasonable and more extortionate, and so extortionate and high in many cases that a suffering public has aroused the indignation of the country and has appealed to Congress, and I am glad to say that the Congress and the President seem not to be deaf to this appeal. [Applause.]

Now, perhaps it would be useless to refer further to the power of Congress to deal with this question. The Granger cases decided that there is a governmental power authorizing the establishing of rates. And since the Granger cases the Supreme Court has decided that the States have the power to authorize the fixing of rates of railroad companies by and through a commission in local or State traffic, and the principle of confiding such a power to a commission by the State is the same principle that upholds the authority of Congress to confer a like power upon a commission to regulate rates in interstate traffic.

The line of demarcation between the powers of the Federal Government and of the State governments have been clearly laid down and observed in a number of railroad cases, just as in other cases not railroad cases. When we had the trust question under consideration, perhaps the best exposition that was found in any case of the power of Congress to deal with combinations or conspiracies against interstate commerce was what is known as the Addyston Pipe case, where a combination of iron pipe companies made agreements in restraint of trade, affecting trade in different States, an agreement to control the markets and to regulate prices. The Supreme Court declared that to be unlawful and contrary to the antitrust act.

The same reasoning applies in these railroad cases, where the power of a State to deal with local matters is differentiated from the power of the Federal Government to deal with interstate traffic.

Now, let me further refer to the necessity for this legislation. That Congress should deal with this question has been apparent for a number of years. The necessity for it became so strong in 1887, ten years before the gentleman from Georgia, my friend Mr. GRIGGS, now listening to me, and I made our advent here. Congress then passed an act conferring the power to regulate this traffic upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. What were some of the reasons why this legislation was necessary? Why, rebates was one of the reasons, where railroads gave to certain favored shippers and withheld these rebates from other shippers. Manifestly the shipper thus discriminated against could not long compete with the shipper thus favored. But the evil of rebates has to some extent been remedied. The morning press to-day shows that under what is known as the "Elkins law," the act of 1903, for which all of us who were here then voted, the present Administration, through its subordinate officers, is now engaged in the laudable undertaking of prosecuting railroads and individuals for giving and receiving rebates. That law penalized rebates, and the fruits of that wise legislation are now being reaped.

But that is not all nor was not all of the necessity for conferring additional powers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is proposed by this side of the House, and I believe by the other side now, to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission these additional powers. I hope that the majority party at this end of the Capitol at last have abandoned the idea of creating some sort of court, of creating some sort of new machinery, or some doubtful method of remedying public evils. I believe they have come to the position of conferring a few more simple powers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. [Applause.]

And what else? Not only rebates, not only discriminatory and unjust and unreasonable rates to be revised, but the private car evil is to be abated. The terminal-facility evil is to be abolished. You can read the reports and the testimony and complaints of the shippers against the private car wrongs and abuses. You can read of the favors that are shown to some and denied to others. They need not be enumerated. Why, a gentleman in this city a few days ago, a commission merchant that does a large business, told me that his business in the sale of butter had been well-nigh ruined and that he was helpless. He said that the private car system as now operated and used by all the large combinations and corporations of the country was one of the greatest evils connected with our present railroad traffic.

The only reason a man can have for desiring private cars is to gain some undue advantage over smaller shippers. To illustrate: Say the cost for shipping a car of butter from Chicago to Washington is 70 cents per 100 pounds, or $140 for a car, minimum weight of 20,000 pounds, and 10,000 additional pounds are loaded in this car. The small shipper must pay an additional amount of $70 on this car. Why? Because the small shipper using the regular public car, the railroad company will be sure to weigh his car and force him to pay the additional charges, while large combinations and corporations who use their own private cars load them in the West themselves and unload them in the East themselves, and the only time the railroad company sees them is when the engine backs into the siding to hook onto these cars to haul them away, and therefore never weigh them. Thus the great advantage to the large corporations in having and using their own private cars. Another illustration: Say a large beef company having their own private refrigerator cars can hang up in these cars 20,000 pounds of beef and then shove in a hundred tubs of butter or a hundred cases of eggs or 50 boxes or dressed poultry under the hanging 20,000 pounds of beef, and thus bring the butter, eggs, or dressed poultry east without additional charge because their cars are not weighed, but come through at the minimum weight of 20,000 pounds. The railroads will say these private cars are weighed just like those of the smaller shippers, but this is not true. These are only a few of the wrongful practices of these large trusts, combinations, and corporations through the assistance of the railroad companies and show a just reason for the abolishment of the private car system. All shippers, large and small, should be treated alike in railroad traffic. All cars should be weighed, and there should be a penalty for not weighing.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose at this time to make a legal argument in regard to railroad rate legislation. Congress ought not to shirk its duty of regulating interstate commerce, a part of which is the transportation of passengers and freight between the States. According to adjudicated cases, Congress has the power to provide for reasonable and just rates and against discriminatory practices, and can confer the administration of this law upon a commission. No constitutional objection can be interposed against such a law for the exercise of such administrative power. The courts have the power to prevent such administration from becoming confiscatory. No one need be disturbed by the refinements of lawyers who oppose the proposed legislation. To give these enlarged powers to the Interstate Commerce Commission is in accordance with the recommendation of the President and in harmony with the demand of the country, and ought to be enacted into law without delay. [Applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, my colleague [Mr. GOULDEN] from New York addressed the House briefly yesterday. He is absent to-day and has requested me to ask unanimous consent that he may have the privilege of extending his remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. GOULDEN] may have opportunity to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the request is granted.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to entertain the House, or to attempt to do so, by any speech on the general subject of insurance or on any of the other questions that have been principally talked about in this debate. Without apology, I venture to call the attention of the committee back to the question which is under discussion. This is a debate about the proper reference of a particular portion of the President's message. It seems to me that unless the House of Representatives is to refuse to give consideration to the President's view in this matter it must necessarily, by reason of the language itself, make one reference, namely, to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It seems to me that the very language of the message itself settles beyond question the propriety of its reference. Whether bills might come before the House dealing with the subject-matter and properly referable to other committees is something that I do not prospose to discuss, because it does not now arise. But the language of the President's message bears reference solely to two things—commerce and regulation. And I repeat, it seems to me that the language of the message settles conclusively the propriety of the reference.

Let us see what the language is, the reference of which we are now talking about. In the first place, the message says:

> The great insurance companies afford striking examples of corporations whose business has extended so far beyond the jurisdiction of the States which created them as to preclude strict enforcement of supervision and regulation by the parent States. In my last annual message I recommended that the Congress carefully consider whether the power of the Bureau of Corporations can not constitutionally be extended to cover interstate transactions in insurance.

The language we are talking about has reference to the regulation of commerce. Gentlemen have cited the Supreme Court of the United States to show that, in their opinion, the Government of the United States may not regulate insurance companies under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution because insurance is not commerce. Whether it is or is not, whether those decisions are controlling or are not controlling, whether they are in point or not, is not a subject pertinent to this discussion. The question is, What reference shall be made of that part of the President's message in which the President of the United States asks Congress to consider the question of the regulation of these insurance companies?

But let me go, Mr. Chairman, a little further into this language. I read:

> But much can be done by legislation which is not only drastic but practical. There is need of a far stricter and more uniform regulation of the vast insurance interests of this country. The United States should in this respect follow the policy of other nations by providing adequate national supervision of commercial interests which are clearly national in character.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss the question as to whether that is right or wrong. I do not propose to discuss the question whether under the Constitution we may or may not do that; but the question before the House, and the only one, is of the proper reference of this language. Clearly it should be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Again, the President says:

> During the Administrations of Presidents Cleveland, Harrison, and McKinley the State Department exercised its influence, through diplomatic channels, to prevent unjust discrimination by foreign countries against American insurance companies. These negotiations illustrated the propriety of the Congress recognizing the national character of insurance, for in the absence of Federal legislation the State Department could only give expression to the wishes of the authorities of the several States, whose policy was ineffectual through want of uniformity.

In one case the President speaks of the regulation of insurance as among the States, and in the next place of the regulation of insurance in the relations between this country and foreign governments.

Again, the President says:

> I repeat my previous recommendation that the Congress should also consider whether the Federal Government has any power or owes any duty with respect to domestic transactions in insurance of an interstate character.

Again:

> The inability of a State to regulate effectively insurance corporations created under the laws of other States and transacting the larger part of their business elsewhere is also clear.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while we have been greatly entertained, perhaps also instructed, by the speeches which have been made in this debate on the general subject of insurance and by the speeches which have been aimed at graft, by the argument which was made yesterday on the general question of the powers of the Federal Government and the States, my purpose in arising is to call the attention of the House to the fact that those speeches, eloquent as they were, able and instructive as they were, had no relation whatever to the question now before the committee, that question being whether we will give a consideration at all to the President's recommendation that the Congress of the United States examine into the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States with reference to the regulation of insurance under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. Neither do I understand those arguments which have tended to maintain that wherever a question of the jurisdiction of the House is up for consideration we should refer the matter to the Judiciary Committee. Every committee of this House has constantly to determine its own jurisdiction and the jurisdiction of the House of the matter referred to it. I admit the great legal ability—I assert, I would rather say, the great legal ability—of the distinguished gentlemen who compose the Committee on the Judiciary, but the subject of the jurisdiction of the Government under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution has been more considered by, and is more in the line of determination of, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce than of the Committee on the Judiciary.

I shall submit, Mr. Chairman, but one consideration further in this matter. It has been argued that the Committee on Ways and Means have jurisdiction of this subject through the taxing power of the Government. If the Government of the United States would propose to tax insurance companies in order to raise revenue, I should agree, possibly, to the proposition; but nobody wants to tax insurance companies. The President of the United States has not referred to it at all with reference to raising revenue. The truth is, that this whole contention comes about, this whole subject is in the minds of the people of this country to-day, not because they want the insurance companies taxed, but because the insurance companies have been taxed too much already by means of "graft." The purpose of the President of the United States, the real purpose of the people of this country, and the object of Members of this House, is not to tax insurance companies, but to preserve the great insurance companies from being pilfered by those who have their management and control. We wish to save their funds, and not to tax them. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I have uniformly voted against any proposition to take jurisdiction of a subject and regulate it under the taxing power, when the raising revenue was a mere pretext. When the proposition was made in this House to tax oleomargarine, believing that it was not the real intention to raise revenue, but that the purpose of the measure was to get jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and if possible tax oleomargarine out of existence, or at least discriminate against one agricultural product in favor of another, deeming an affirmative vote—I am not criticising the position of anybody, but speaking for myself—deeming an affirmative vote on that subject was an abuse of our constitutional power, I voted in the negative.

I wish to raise no question or express any opinion on this question of jurisdiction under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. I hope to give that question study in the future, untrammeled by any expression of opinion beforehand; but there is one subject upon which I have made up my mind sufficiently to say what course I would pursue. If it is attempted under the pretext of the taxing power of the Government, revenue not being the real object, to take jurisdiction of these insurance companies, I should vote against it. The only hope for Federal regulation of this subject is to refer this question to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Members in this House will not vote to take jurisdiction of the question under the taxing power of the Constitution.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a good deal has been said on the subject of the centralization of power. Something might be said on the general subject of the centralization of power in this House. The Committee on Ways and Means is a great committee; under the rules of the House it is made so; its traditions make it great; its personnel in the present House makes it a great committee. But the Committee on Ways and Means should not attempt, when at particular times interest in the country in special questions gives to some other committee a prominent position, to deprive that committee of its just opportunity and proper jurisdiction of measures that come before the House.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, my purpose in rising was to call attention of the committee to the fact that in my opinion the very language of the President's message itself determines the proper and the only proper reference of this subject in this House. [Applause.]

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday in this House, when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] was describing the decadence of legislative bodies in our country, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] interrupted and asked him this question:

> Is it not true that gentlemen from Southern States, Democrats from Southern States, have marked tendency to yield up their idea of States rights in order that their State and that their district may get some benefit or emolument out of the United States Government?

Later on during the day this same gentleman from New York, in some remarks he made, made the statement that—

> There is a marked tendency on the part of gentlemen, Members of this House, Democrats from Southern States, to surrender the doctrines which they inherited from Calhoun and to abandon their ideas of States rights in order that they may get a little pork in the barrel or that they may get some benefit from the Central Government for their several States or districts.

I confess to a fondness for this gentleman from New York—a friendship for him. I shall be charitable to him, and express the belief that in this utterance he had no malicious sectional feeling, no intention to fling at the character of southern Democratic representation in this House, but that in an effort to express his contempt for rare instances observed in this House where pelf played its part—not confined by any means to this side of the House—he stated his question so broadly as to suggest inferences not intended by the genial gentleman.

And this view is reenforced, in my mind, by the fact which I know, that he is both a good lawyer and Republican, and logically he would not have taken that position—being a good Republican and a good lawyer—for he must know that in any system of bribery the briber is meaner than the bribed; that if it were true generally of southern representation here that there was a marked tendency to surrender their convictions and their principles for "pork," the idea at once would be irresistible that that side of the Chamber controlled the "barrel," and were willing to put in the "pork" in order to debauch principle and conviction, and the reflection upon the committees and their chairmen and the Speaker himself on that side, by that sort of a contention, would be far greater than any fling at character here. And this inclines me to offer some observations to this House along this very line.

During the four years that I have been a Member of this House my service here has made me more of a Democrat than ever, but far less of a partisan. I have come to deprecate seriously and earnestly the constant tendency, which I see more or less exhibited on both sides of this Chamber, to drag every character of question arising in the whole domain of governmental legislation into the field of bitter partisan political debate and action. There is no sense in it, there is no justice in it, there is no wisdom in it, and the people do not approve it. These questions of public buildings, of river and harbor improvements, of agricultural appropriations, of the necessary supplies for those functions of government the exercise of which all men agree to, ought not to be made the means of any partisan advantage by anybody in this House. Nothing could be more foolish and pernicious than that we should drift into a line of procedure by which a public building in a district, or a river and harbor appropriation in a district, or an agricultural appropriation touching an agricultural district should be made the means of coercing the Member from that district into a course that his conscience did not approve of, or restrain him from following the course that his conscience dictated. We have divisions clear and well defined. We should adhere to these where each party man deems the doctrine of his party best for the public good. Let us fight it out on those lines like honorable men, and like honest prize fighters shake hands before and after the fight and accept the decision of the referee as final in the case.

In my judgment the true course, dictated by sound business sense and wise statesmanship as well, for each of us and for our party leaders to pursue in the discharge of our duties here is this: While on the one hand we recognize the value of party and loyalty to it, on the other hand constantly endeavor to approach any question from a nonpartisan point of view, with patriotic common sense, and only allow the question to enter the field of party politics when party principles or policies of necessity force its admission. Such a course universally adopted by those who control here on both sides would raise the dignity of this body, and make impossible its polution by such tendency.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that there has been any marked tendency of the character indicated in that statement on this side of the House. I like the word "tendency." It is a good word. I like the word "marked." It is a good word. Down in our section we mark our hogs to restrain the tendency among certain classes fraudently to appropriate them. And if we can mark now and then an incident on either side of this House of the character indicated and check the tendency to destroy our individual force and power here, I am heartily in favor of having it done. [Applause.]

I have no word of complaint against the President or the Speaker or the chairman of a committee in any legitimate and honorable way aiding what he believes for the best interests of the country. But sometimes the line is not sharply drawn, and the boundary beyond which the power of these great positions ought not to be exercised to coerce the conscience or the will of any representative of a free constituency under our republican form of government is crossed, much more to the discredit of those who corrupt than he who may be corrupted.

But I wish to say a few words, Mr. Chairman, about the particular matter now pending before this House. The latitude of debate has extended far away from the real question, which I regard as one of vast importance. To what committee of this House shall be referred that portion of the President's message which treats of Federal control of insurance in this country? To my mind it strikes me as irresistible that this debate logically forces the House, if it would maintain its ancient usages, its precedents, and if it would act in accord with the proprieties of the occasion, to refer this matter to the Judiciary Committee of the House, with instructions to report to the House our power in the premises. Here we find all shades of opinion; some who believe that under the commerce clause of the Constitution this subject may be handled legislatively; others who believe that under the taxing power of the Constitution this subject may be handled constitutionally. So far as I am concerned individually I agree with neither view. I have not the slightest idea that this House has any power over this great subject upon either proposition; but regardless of that I shall vote, if I get an opportunity, to refer this subject to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report to this House as to the powers of the House in the matter, so that it may be determined according to correct usages as I see them.

Mr. Chairman, no man in this House is more earnestly in favor of the exercise of the power of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution to control and regulate the great transportation agencies of this country than myself. I made the first speech in this House in approval of the recommendation of President Roosevelt's message upon the rate question at the last session of Congress. I said then, and I repeat now, that in the face of utter silence on the subject in the national platforms of his party, and in the absence of any such legislation being recommended favorably by any committee of either branch of Congress, both in control of his party, that President Roosevelt was to be commended for indorsing a thrice-repeated national-platform demand of Democrats, and of right could count on their support of his recommendation to confer the power on the Commerce Commission to substitute a just rate on investigation for one found unjust.

I have no doubt of our constitutional power to do that. But, Mr. Chairman, that is as far as I am willing to go. I am not willing by judicial construction, by a strained and unnatural view, to extend the power of Congress under the commerce clause so that we can draw under the control of the Federal Government every business on the face of the earth that is transacted between residents of various States. If under that clause of the Constitution Congress may assume control over the insurance companies of the land, then I ask you where will you draw the line, where will you stop in the exercise of such a power as that? You could by the same construction control the cotton brokers of the land and the wheat and grain merchants of the land, the iron-ore and coal dealers of the land. You could control almost every one of the great businesses, corporate and individual, that are so wrought into the very fabric of our Republic. If we begin this forced construction to satisfy the public clamor, there will be no end to the pushing of that power further and further in legislation.

I am also unalterably opposed, Mr. Chairman, to Congress assuming control over this matter by use of the taxing powers of Congress under the Federal Constitution. I am an old-fashioned Democrat. I am not ready yet to surrender that ancient, time-honored doctrine that the taxing power was granted for no purpose except to raise revenue to run an honest and economical Government. [Applause.] I do not care whether the issue be protection, ship subsidy, insurance, or any other that may arise under the stress of public clamor; I am opposed to using the taxing power for any other purpose than that for which it was originally designed by the framers of that immortal instrument itself.

There can really be no contention in the light of the debate which occurred at the time of its adoption in the light of the early history of this country, when statesmen talked about the power of the Constitution in section 8; there can be no question of its purpose. If we take Federal control of insurance by virtue of the taxing power, as the distinguished gentleman from New York argued, although it might produce the wise result he desires of confining insurance companies to the States of their origin—and I am not prepared to say it would not or that it would be a bad result—it would involve a method destructive to every Democratic position upon every other great question in the land. It would be a clear perversion of the taxing power beyond all question. I am not willing, for myself, to subscribe to this doctrine.

I fully agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], that this House could and should arrest its decadence and assume the dominance intended for it by the framers of the Constitution by an unfaltering assertion of its powers under the Constitution. I remember listening with a fascination that lingers still to an eloquent and profound address, beautifully adorned after his own manner by historical illustration, delivered by the gifted gentleman on this subject in the Fifty-eighth Congress. Then he pathetically portrayed the deep decadence of the House and proudly pointed the way to attain absolute control in the Government. He said the House, under the Constitution, holds the purse strings of the nation, that it could dominate by simply saying, "We will neither raise nor appropriate revenue for such a purpose." With that view I am in full accord. But, Mr. Chairman, much as I long to see this House rise to the place in our plan of government intended for it by the framers of the Constitution, much as I deplore its abject submission to other departments of the Government, I am not willing it shall attain the one and escape the other by a perversion, a misuse of the taxing powers it possesses, nor can such method in the long run attain those ends. An unwarranted extension by the House of its powers would only react on its standing and augment rather than check the decay of powers. Strength can not be improved by straining the muscles. The powers of the House should be continually, firmly asserted, but care should ever be exercised that none of our powers are sought to be extended beyond the legitimate scope of their functions.

I know that in my State a vast interest is felt in this question. I presume, without having had occasion to look up the statistics, that, in proportion to population and wealth, there are more policy holders in Texas in the three great insurance companies than in any other State in the land. We are first in nearly everything else, and I will assume that we are first in that. [Laughter.] I feel very certain that many men there interested in this question would be willing to have anything done on earth that would protect the policy holders. But here the question is not one of yielding to the clamor of any individuals, it is a question here of the wise exercise of the powers of the Constitution under our oath of office.

Nor have I any doubt, Mr. Chairman, of the complete and ample power of a State to control this whole subject beneficially to the policy holder. Every lawyer who has had occasion to look into the subject knows not only that the Supreme Court has knocked out the commerce clause applying to the question, but it is held that each State has absolute power over the question. It can regulate the companies in it and fix the terms upon which foreign insurance companies shall do business in the State. The Supreme Court has gone so far as to say that a State may absolutely prohibit any insurance company doing business in its State, and it would not be in violation of the Constitution or of any law of the land. So that we come at last to the question so ably discussed by my friend, the distinguished and eloquent gentleman whom I expect will have a bright career, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], when he said that the power of the people existed and need only to be aroused, and that the farther the exercise of power was put from the people the more dangerous to the people.

There are many instances in our history to verify that great truth. It ought not to need much discussion either by Democrats or Republicans. Our theory of government, which our fathers loved, and which now and then some of us have come to sneer at, was that we founded a government in which we put under our feet all other forms of government in which any of the power travels down to the people, and we founded one in which all the power was vested in the people and traveled up from the people through their officers, working automatically, as the great tides ebb and flow, and at last returns to the people, the source of all power, to be exercised more wisely if they see fit. Keep the exercise of power as close to the people as possible is a political position the wisdom of which is illustrated by all history. It is not so much a question of "State rights," the right is conceded; it is a question of State duty and of the wisdom or folly of removing the discharge of duty farther from the people.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that these insurance companies have skinned the country to the limit. It is true that a lot of their officers ought to be in the penitentiary. It is true that there can be no defense in law or morals to the squandering of the trust funds and the contributions of it to members of their own families and to political parties and to every other sort of chicanery and devilment that ingenuity, intelligence, and opportunity could afford. But who has been to blame? If the people in the States had been active and energetic, if their representatives had been intelligent and active, who will say that the power is not sufficient in the States in which these companies are doing business to have prevented occurrences like these? Now, because we have drifted along with the tendency to supineness—and people have been aroused to the importance of the question now that these things have occurred—shall we apply at once to the Federal power and confess our impotence to protect ourselves by the exercise of our conceded State powers?

For one, I am not willing to do that. For one, I believe that on this subject, as on the subject of Government ownership of railroads, the strongest argument that can be made against all these false theories tending toward socialism, communism, and nationalism, is that if in a representative form of Government we can not elect officials who will enact good laws and enforce them so as to protect the people, then we are helpless under our form of government, and it can be accomplished in no other way. If we can not pass good laws to regulate and control and supervise, for instance, the great transportation agencies of the country, who can expect that we will elect officers under whom they will be adequately and efficiently managed by Government ownership? If our public servants can not be trusted to enact and enforce laws which supervise, restrain, and control these corporations, how can they be expected to elect officers who will efficiently and honestly operate them if the Government owned them. Supervision along national lines on the transportation question is a necessary concurrent remedy, and it grows out of the fact of the nature of transportation, which must be interstate, and in all other questions the same proposition holds with reference to state, county, and municipal control and regulation. You tell me that in a great city like New York, for instance, there is no power to elect honest officers and enact and enforce wise and just laws which shall control the municipal corporations of the city, but that the city could turn around and elect a set of men who, if it owned those utilities, could economically and honestly administer them, and I tell you that no man can believe that.

Supervision and control at the first doorstep where it can be exerted is a remedy for all these evils of which the country is complaining. Wise laws and their strict enforcement along the line of regulation and control are the things we need. We only go on from the State governments and State railroad commissions to the Federal Government and Federal commissions upon the transportation question because of the fact that interstate-transportation laws are without the pale of control of States and State boards, and for no other reason could a Democrat for a moment tolerate the doctrine. I welcome this whole discussion, Mr. Chairman, I will say by way of conclusion, because, being a Democrat, I am one of those who believe every discussion in the land, in Congress and out of Congress, which points the minds of the people to the Constitution of the United States, to the Declaration of Independence, to the glorious early history of our country, to our traditions and fundamental principles must at last inure to the benefit of the only party that has been able always to survive wreck and ruin and come out of desolation and despair and march in solid phalanx again to victory because of agreement on fundamental principles. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I can offer little excuse at this time for occupying the attention of the committee for a moment. Early in this discussion I had thought I might say something on the question before the committee which might serve as a suggestion for its correct disposition, but it seems to me that everything has been said which ought to have been said and much has been said which ought to have been left unsaid. I have, somehow or other, as a new Member, been impressed with the idea that we ought in this Congress to heed the injunction of the Speaker in his inaugural, when he said that we should proceed to the business of the Congress and dispose of it at an early date. It seems, however, to have been the custom whenever a question is up before the Committee of the Whole to grant the widest latitude of discussion, and very frequently the pending matter is not touched upon at all.

I believe if we had a rule that would confine all discussion to the real question at issue it would conserve the best interests of the country and would save many of the Members from themselves. Much of the discussion that has occurred here has been uttered for the purposes of home consumption, and I submit that if a rule such as I have suggested had been adopted at the beginning of the session it would have been of great political value to certain gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate, and, besides, would have saved the Democratic party much humiliation and would have left the country with a more exalted notion of the character and dignity of the American Congress. The country cares little for what we say here unless declaration is the certain promise of doing. It is deeply interested in what we do here. It must be that an intelligent constituency understands why irrelevant speeches are made and will not be satisfied with words, however eloquently spoken, when great national needs require action.

The question which has been pending before the committee for now nearly a week is that of submitting to a committee of the House that part of the President's message which relates to insurance, and I submit that if that subject had been submitted to the Speaker without any amendment and without any discussion there would have been no question but what he would have been sustained if he had referred it to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Every sentiment, nearly, in the statement which the President makes in his message on insurance pertains to matters akin to interstate commerce. Insurance is so intricately woven and interwoven into commercial relations that it can not be separated from them readily, and to the committee having charge of interstate commerce the mind naturally turns in referring the matter. But the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee presents an amendment to refer to his committee. Why specify this committee if it belongs there? The Speaker would refer it there. But the gentleman went further; he foreclosed the possibility or probability of any remedy except by taxation, and refused to commit himself to any plan under which even that method could be worked. Other gentlemen have suggested that the judiciary was the proper committee of reference. It might be proper to ask the judiciary if there is any constitutional relief possible, but in the meanwhile Members may present bills on the subject of regulation, and they should be considered by some committee other than the judiciary, and then, if it is thought best by the Congress, it can submit these bills or any of them to the Judiciary Committee for its legal opinion. It seems to me it would be premature to remit the whole subject to a really nonlegislative committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said before, I do not care to occupy the attention of the House except to call its attention to the fact that these questions are largely artificial which have been raised here. The main question is simply to dispose of it, and if we should defeat the amendment and let this message take its regular course there could be no complaint on the part of any Member of this House, and every individual Member would be entitled to present such a bill as seems to meet his views on this question, and when his bill was put up then there would be time for some of these speeches which have been made here, and some of them, at least, would be pertinent to the question under discussion. So I say, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, without taking any more of your time, because I believe that we ought to be about the business of this Congress, it seems to me that the proper place naturally would have been to refer this matter to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, but now the solution of the problem, in my humble judgment, is to let it take its regular course and allow the Speaker, who is wise enough to deal with, to place it where, in his judgment, it seems best it should be placed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is next on the list, but as he is not present the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] will be recognized.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the parliamentary situation we are now in, we are discussing a motion made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to refer the President's message, and the different subjects suggested by it, to the various and appropriate committees of this House for consideration by those committees. That being true, we are necessarily embarked upon a somewhat general discussion of that message, and I want to say, in answer to the suggestion last made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], that I do not think this House is wasting any time which it could otherwise utilize at the present juncture, while its committees are taking no action on pending bills, when it undertakes a general discussion of questions of state suggested by the President's message. In this body for years, under the old leaders like Calhoun and Clay, when the President of the United States in his message to the Congress undertook to set out the great questions of state which were before the public mind there was a general and free debate in the House of Representatives and in the Senate of the United States upon the recommendations made by him. That being true, I desire to call the attention of this committee, in a few words, to one particular part of the President's message, which will be referred, of course, to the Committee on Ways and Means. On the subject of revenues, on page 17 of the President's printed message, we find an abbreviated discussion of the tariff question. Hardly half a page, as the printed document comes to us, is devoted to that discussion; just about the same amount of space the President of this great country devotes to the discussion of the Jamestown Exposition. He devotes just about the same amount of space to the discussion of this great tariff question that he devotes to the discussion of "national parks," and just about one-half as much space as he devotes to the consideration of the Indian question. The President says:

> There is more need of stability than of the attempt to attain an ideal perfection in the methods of raising revenue; and the shock and strain to the business world certain to attend any serious change in these methods render such change inadvisable unless for grave reason. It is not possible to lay down any general rule by which to determine the moment when the reasons for will outweigh the reasons against such a change. Much must depend, not merely on the needs, but on the desires of the people as a whole; for needs and desires are not necessarily identical. Of course no change can be made on lines beneficial to, or desired by, one section or one State only. There must be something like a general agreement among the citizens of the several States, as represented in the Congress, that the change is needed and desired in the interest of the people as a whole; and there should then be a sincere, intelligent, and disinterested effort to make it in such shape as will combine, so far as possible, the maximum of good to the people at large with the minimum of necessary disregard for the special interests of localities or classes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there never was a plainer gage of battle thrown down by an Executive of this Republic than this declaration of the President. It is apparent that his idea of dealing with the great question of raising revenues for this Government by means of tariff legislation is based on the idea that the people of this nation ought to have only so much general relief as can be afforded them without too great injury to special localities and special classes already favored by the existing law and as will keep them from open and serious revolt, for it is indeed true that what he considers their "needs" and what he knows are their "desires" are not identical in this matter.

In contradistinction to this doctrine of the Republican party that favored localities and classes are not to be disturbed, so truly and accurately stated by him, I desire to invite the attention of this body to the first national Democratic platform, adopted sixty-five years ago. It is a real exposition of genuine democracy, for it declared, among other things, that "justice and sound policy forbid the Federal Government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of another or to cherish one part to the injury of another part of our common country; that every citizen has a right to demand and insist upon an equality of right and privilege." In my judgment that is the battle cry which the real opposition to the Republican party in the future will raise. It is a standard about which those forces will assemble—equal rights to all and special privileges to none. No man will dare deny the absolute fairness and justice of that proposition, as an abstract question, and yet when we come to a practical application of the doctrine there are few who dare to stand by it. We find some of the most glaring, some of the most remarkable instances of inequality in rights and privileges in those laws by which our revenues are raised for the support of this Government, in high protection "for protection's sake," and I want to invite the attention of this House, as briefly as I can in the short time I shall occupy its attention, to some of those inequalities. In the first place, let us inquire what this system means, where did it originate, and where does it lead? It means that one class of people of this great Republic—to wit, the manufacturing class—shall be allowed by law to levy a heavy, binding, unjust, and unjustifiable tax on all the balance of the people, the great body of the American consumers. It means by law we are building up a class of multimillionaires. It means that by the operation of your tariff laws you shut out foreign competition, and by combinations and consolidations, usually for the control of the transportation facilities, you throttle domestic competition. To-day we have more multimillionaires in this Republic than we had poor, poverty-stricken millionaires a few short years ago, and there are to-day in this country hundreds of men who could buy many great cities and even many sovereign States of this Republic. The great State of Georgia, in which I live, has about $500,000,000 of taxable values. Rockefeller could buy it twice over, and his fortune has been built up to this dangerous extent by the use of these two agencies—a high protective tariff and the control of transportation facilities.

How did the protective tariff originate? Why, you would think, to hear the discussion in this Chamber and on the other side of this Capitol, that the Republican party was born of a gold-standard father and a high-protective-tariff mother. On the contrary, the Republican party was born of a great moral issue, of oposition to human slavery and of a determination to prevent its extension. When it acquired possession of the Federal Government in 1861 it was forced, in order to conduct one of the bloodiest and costliest wars that ever devastated this earth, to raise large revenues by heavy import duties and many other taxes to carry on that struggle. When its first platform was framed, and when its second was issued to the people, on which it won at the polls in 1860, it declared no policy on the tariff. When the war was over there were three reasons that induced the Republican party to continue the high protective tariff policy forced upon them by war expenses. The first was because they had to meet the large expenses that grew out of the war, including the expenses of an enormous pension system, and the second was their natural opposition to all the doctrines of the Democratic party, including the historic doctrine of that party in favor of a tariff for revenue only. The third reason was the specious plea of great business interests, who always take an ell when you give them an inch, and who insisted that by the high war tariff their interests had become "vested," and that it would be unfair to change the schedules and to ruin those interests. They were doubtless well able, as they were surely well willing, to enforce that argument with arguments of a more practical character in the shape of huge campaign contributions to the various Republican campaign funds.

I imagine that this practical argument must have had more effect on the old leaders of the Republican party even than the purely theoretical argument of "vested interests," for it is reported that those gentlemen were not entirely unfamiliar with the old but homely adage, "It is money that makes the mare go." In the early days of the Republic the proposition was never advanced by any statesman or by any political party that any more revenue ought to be raised by tariff legislation—by import duties—than was absolutely necessary to run this Government economically and honestly. Of course it was conceded by everybody—by all parties and all statesmen—that while you were raising this amount of revenue, incidental protection ought to be given to our infant industries, which at that time were struggling with the powerful and jealous competition of Europe. But it was never contended by any party or statesman that the "protection" given should be determined mainly by the needs, necessities, or greed of the favored and protected classes rather than the necessities of governmental revenue, or that protected industry ought to receive continued, unending, and eternal protection long after it was no longer infantile, but had grown to giant size and strength. It has remained for latter-day—Republican—statesmanship to make this contention.

There are certain tendencies that grow out of this tariff system which you have built up, sustained, and perpetuated to which I wish to call attention. In the first place I want to inquire, What effect does this system have upon the foreign policy of our Government? it leads to land grabbing, to "world powering," to imperialism, and colonialism, with all their attendant evils. Do you imagine that the strenuous President who sits at the other end of this avenue could ever have successfully swung his mighty whip over the rebellious backs of his party chieftains, or used his big stick to club them into lamb-like line, if he had pursued a foreign policy which was against the will and wishes of his party? Oh, no; he succeeded because he personified and exemplified the real wishes, the real purposes, the real ambitions of the Republican party. What do "world powering," land grabbing, colony holding, and imperialism lead to? What do they require to support them? Large armies and larger navies; large in time of peace and larger still in time of war. What does that mean? It means more Government contracts, more ships, Congress after Congress, and more money. And how are you going to get the money except by more taxation, and by more tariff taxation every time? So what better foreign policy do the protected interests of this country desire than the policy of the President, with all of his imperialistic and land-grabbing ideas? What do they care if he should keep open some canal zone in some Colombian republic of the future by sending his war ships down and keeping the ships and forces of the sovereign country from reasserting a sovereignty which he himself had guaranteed by solemn treaty? What do they care if he does continue to "civilize" Filipinos at the cost of one hundred millions a year? What do they care if he does enforce upon the republics of South America not the strenuous life of the great that he practices himself, but the simple life of good, as he becomes the debt collector from those peoples for all European nations?

It simply means more taxation, more tariff, more money to be taken from the consumer to be poured into the laps of the favored classes.

The system leads also to governmental extravagance and dishonesty. The President of the United States, in his message to the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, said it was a matter of common knowledge that bribery and fraud and corruption honeycombed the Government service everywhere. Are you surprised at that? How can it be strange? Are you surprised that the individual officeholders of a party that is based on public plunder do not abstain from acts of personal piracy themselves? Suppose they do steal a few millions; what does it mean? It means more taxes, more tariff, more protection to the favored classes of this Republic. The system also leads to the wholesale corruption of the electorate. All over this Republic there are great "vested" interests that have been built up under this tariff; that are grateful for past favors and have a lively appreciation of future benefits, but who realize that they get their unfair privileges from the law; who hope to retain those privileges by the favor of the parties and men who control the Federal Government and the various State and municipal governments, and are willing to pay thousands and millions for that favor, and who do pay it.

On this subject I wish to call the attention of this committee to the very recent words of Prof. Charles W. Mixter, of the University of Vermont. He said:

> Protection leads to things that are manifestly unfair. It leads to the debauchery of the electorate and to the lowering of the whole tone of our civic life.

Right here I wish to call public attention to the brazen shamelessness with which this is virtually confessed. Yesterday they had a field day in New York before the legislative committee investigating the insurance scandals, and one of the witnesses was one of these great "captains of industry" who really control and really govern this land. He went on the stand to testify, and I want to read to you just one little colloquy that he had with Mr. Hughes, the attorney representing the investigating committee. The gentleman that I refer to was Mr. E. H. Harriman. He testified in this way. Mr. Hughes asked him this question:

It has been openly charged that you get your political influence through your relations with Mr. Odell?

When Mr. Harriman was asked this question, what did he say? He said:

I should say that Mr. Odell gets his political influence through his relations with me.

[Laughter.]

Shameless, brazen! This man, apparently, gloats in the confession and when he went into the explanation of his language the more he floundered the deeper he got into the mire, and finally he said: "Well, I expect, maybe, that Mr. Odell may not exactly like the way I put the thing."

Even about that he was not certain, but he thought possibly Governor Odell might not like it!

This great tariff system of ours, as operated at present, is the hotbed of class favoritism and the prolific source of corruption, and yet the President says that whenever we do reform the tariff he wants it done with as little disturbance as possible to favored localities and favored classes. That is a fine doctrine, a fine theory, on which to run a great democratic country, whose proudest boast has been in the past that it was the land of the "square deal."

Now, there are one or two other subjects to which I desire to refer, and then I shall have finished. I want to call your attention to what I believe is another notorious instance of special privilege, in which justice is denied to the plain people of this Republic, and that is the national banking system. Under our existing laws we permit $450,000,000 of the currency of this Republic to be controlled and contracted at will by the national banks, and absolutely we are so much pleased at their generosity, their philanthropy, and their disinterestedness in undertaking to handle this money for us and to control this currency for us that we give them $13,000,000 a year for their philanthropy in doing so—$13,000,000 a year in interest. And yet I want to say to you that the national banking currency is nothing more nor less than fiat money. Why? Because back of it and behind it there is nothing more nor less than the bond of the Government; and what is the bond of the Government except the written promise of the Government to pay? And I say to you if the written promise of the Government to pay can and does indirectly float this much money, it can do it directly, and we can save the $13,000,000 a year and let the Government control her own currency and issue it directly to that extent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

At the bar of the world's progressive thought it has long since been adjudicated that one of the fairest and most equitable ways of raising revenue for the support of the Government is by an income tax. And what is the Republican position upon that question? You say the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that an income tax is unconstitutional, because of that provision in our Constitution that direct taxation shall be apportioned among the several States in accordance with population. I say to you that if that is true you ought to give the people of this country some relief on this question by joining us in amending the Constitution of the United States so that we can have an income tax. Surely the Republican conscience can not revolt at a plain proposition to amend the Constitution. It has not hesitated on other questions to amend it, even at the point of the sword. Besides, in the Fifty-eighth Congress there were many measures pending looking toward the enactment of an income tax, measures always introduced by Democrats, according to my recollection, with the idea of giving the Supreme Court another opportunity to pass upon that great question. Since the former decision was rendered the personnel of the Court has changed, and as it has already changed its mind on this income-tax question once or twice, perhaps with the present personnel of the court it might change it again. If you gentlemen on the other side of the aisle are really the friends of the plain people of this Republic, you ought to help us on this matter and let us get it where the great question can be passed upon again by the Supreme Court.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have heard much talk on both sides of this Chamber, and there has been much talk in the country about radicalism and conservatism. In my judgment, both terms have been both misused and abused. In my judgment, the most radical of all radicals is the ultra conservative, and the most conservative of all conservatives is the moderate and liberal radical. A little more radicalism or liberalism, as you please, and a little less conservatism would have saved the throne and the head of the first Charles and averted the French Revolution. A little less radicalism and a little more conservatism and our fathers would never have shaken off the yoke of Great Britain and established this glorious Republic. When you speak to me about conservatism and radicalism, I want to know what you mean. If to protest against existing inequalities, if to favor the righting of vested wrongs, if to demand that all men shall have equal rights and that none shall enjoy special privileges makes a man a radical, then I for one glory in the title, and I believe the day is not far distant when a vast majority of the people of this Republic will welcome the appellation, when the Democratic party, not grieving over spilled milk, with past differences forgotten, with its face to the future, will get together and insist on a plain, fair, square, honest deal being given to every man in this country. And when they make that the slogan, when they apply the fundamental doctrine of equality to all and special privilege to none, with logical fairness, to every public question, whenever that day comes, the Democratic party will again come into power, whether our leader shall be that great Democrat from the wheat fields of Nebraska, whose every heart beat is in sympathy with the needs and desires of the plain people of the Republic, or whether it shall be that young giant from the great State of Missouri, who is engaged in a great work for civic righteousness in this Republic, or whether New England or the North or the South or the West is called upon to contribute a leader whose record and life shall proclaim him fair and just to all, we will at last succeed when we get back to the great fundamental principle of equal rights to all and of special privileges to none. [Great applause.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I confess I have no sympathy with the impatience manifested by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TOWNSEND] at the failure of this House to readily submit without question the jurisdiction of this subject to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I have not come to regard this House, much as I esteem it, as a body that is fitted to provide a remedy for every disease in the body politic. In my own brief experience I have seen several signal failures. I have observed the consumers of the United States begging at the doors of the Ways and Means Committee for relief from heavy tariff burdens, and I have observed that it turned a deaf ear to the popular clamor. I have observed others asking for remedial legislation that haven't met with that success which the gentleman from Minnesota seems to think will follow upon the submission of this question to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Nor do I agree with him that the question raised in this discussion is an artificial and useless question. I believe it is a proper question, such as is developed always in the orderly discussion of a case before a legal tribunal or of a subject of legislation before a legislative assembly, and I would much prefer that a competent body of this House should declare that this House had no jurisdiction over the proposed subject of legislation than that it should, in response to popular clamor, hastily frame legislation which subsequently could not be sustained on constitutional grounds before the Supreme Court of the United States. I believe that no time is wasted in this discussion. I heard yesterday a matchless exposure of the sinister methods of the life insurance company presidents that I believe will have a wholesome effect on the people of the United States.

I heard a vigorous and exhaustive discussion of the old-fashioned Democratic doctrine of individual initiative and of the right of States to govern in their local affairs which I believe will have a salutary effect upon the country, and I heard the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] sum up both of those discussions in his usual able manner, for he touches no subject that he does not adorn. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I believe that not one moment has been wasted in the discussion of this question. I believe it would be folly to enter rashly upon a consideration of the method of dealing with an acknowledged abuse before we first determine our jurisdictional right to deal with the subject at all. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I trust that this question will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, a body of competent and trained lawyers, to settle the first question that arises, the jurisdictional question, and report back to this House whether there is jurisdiction at all for this proposed subject of legislation.

I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to any further weakening of the powers of the States of this Union by increasing the power of the Federal Government, except in one single class of cases, and that is where it becomes necessary for a community, by lack of power to protect itself against depredation and aggression, to appeal to the power of the Federal Government. Whenever it is discovered from the nature of the proposed subject that local legislation is inadequate to deal with it, then it is proper to turn to the Congress of the United States for relief, and whenever we deal with a subject that local legislation may deal with properly, I say that that subject should not be removed from the sphere of State legislation until it has first been ascertained definitely that the State legislature, by reason of the nature of the subject or for any other reason, is absolutely incompetent to deal with it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt, I believe, of the wisdom of the original grant to the Federal Government of the power to deal with the subject of taxation. Neither can there be any question raised to-day of the wisdom of the grant to the Federal Government of the power to deal with interstate and foreign commerce, the exercise of which power has resulted in that uniformity of regulation which it was the intention of the framers of that instrument to accomplish. But I take it also that there may be great doubts in the minds of many as to the wisdom of the application of the taxing power in particular instances. I take it also that there are grave doubts in the minds of many students of public questions as to the wisdom of the extension of the power to deal with foreign and interstate commerce over new subjects of legislation, which subjects were not and could not have been in the contemplation of the framers of the immortal instrument. Now, one of the reasons advanced on the floor yesterday for dealing with this subject through the taxing power was that it would help to restore the fallen power of this body itself. I for one, Mr. Chairman, would not use the taxing power for that purpose, much as I regret the lost prestige of this body. I believe the taxing power was given to it, as to all governments, for a single, specific purpose—namely, to raise revenue sufficient to run the Government honestly and economically. Whenever that reason fails to exist, the reason which justifies taxation in any form fails to exist at the same moment. Now, I believe that the power of this House may be restored without abusing the power of taxation. The power of the House has been lost through the rules which the House itself has adopted. The remedy may be found in the same way. We may alter those rules. I would not like to see appropriation bills loaded down with items of legislation. I would not welcome a system that would compel the tired and jaded lawyer to search in the haystack of Federal appropriation items for the needle of legislation. I prefer a more orderly system of legislation than that. I would prefer that appropriation items, and those alone, be contained in appropriation bills, and that legislation be dealt with only upon legislative measures. I believe that the House has the power to bring back its own prestige by an amendment to the rules which have enslaved the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, with this preliminary statement of general principles, I come to a discussion of the question, and I must remark in the beginning that I am not one of those who believe that the President of the United States, honored as he is by all of us, is infallible either in his law, in his judgment of State policies, or in his recollection of conversations with distinguished visitors. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] He states in his message that—

> The great insurance companies afford striking examples of corporations whose business has extended so far beyond the jurisdiction of the States which created them as to preclude strict enforcement of supervision and regulation by the parent States.

I for one do not agree with that proposition, humble lawyer though I am. I believe there is sufficient power in the legislature of each State in the Union to govern the administration of the business of companies that it has created by its own charter, and also to govern the conduct of foreign corporations that do business within the confines of that State. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Nor do I agree with the statement of the Chief Executive that the inability of the State to regulate effectively the insurance corporations created under the laws of other States and transacting the larger part of their business elsewhere is also clear. I do not believe that the proper effort has been made to regulate the business of foreign corporations in those States in which the scandal occurred which led to the desire for this legislation. Nor do I agree with the statement—or suggestion rather, because it does not take the form of a direct statement—that because Congress has given power to publish statistics concerning the business of insurance it follows that Congress has the power to deal with the subject of insurance itself.

Now, then, the question before this Congress is, To what committee shall the subject of the President's message relating to insurance matters be referred? The committees mentioned are the Ways and Means, Interstate and Foreign Comerce, and the Judiciary. First let us consider the propriety of the Committee on Ways and Means taking jurisdiction of this question. If they the Ways and Means, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and the tax upon the business of insurance. Now, it seems to me that there is a decisive objection to that in the very beginning in that there is no necessity for raising additional revenues in the United States. The maddest jingo in the country would not base his support of the proposition to tax insurance policies upon the ground that there is a necessity to raise larger revenues in order that we may build more ships of war. The maddest advocate of a ship subsidy would not base his advocacy of a tax upon insurance upon the ground that additional revenues must be created in order to grant bounties to avaricious shipowners. Not a single public man, not a man upon the floor of this House upon either side, not a newspaper, so far as I have been able to discover, has even hinted that there is a necessity of adding a single dollar to the revenues of the United States. Why, then, should this proposition be submitted to the Committee on Ways and Means? It ought not to impose a tax unless there is a necessity for revenue, and no man yet has dared to state in this House that there is a necessity for an additional dollar of revenue. Now, then, suppose we pass that question and assume that the Committee on Ways and Means decides that they do not exercise jurisdiction because of their desire to increase the revenue, but simply for the purpose of regulating the business of insurance. I think the decisive answer to that is that the business of insurance can be better regulated by the legislatures of 45 States of this Union, widely scattered and far more removed from corrupt and sinister influences than by a single legislative body which sits in its deliberations in the city of Washington. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But suppose they go so far as the consideration of the imposition of that tax. What kind of a tax, pray, would they impose? Would it be a tax for the destruction of the business of these companies, such as was imposed upon the circulation of State banks? I take it no man would assert here or elsewhere that the business of life insurance ought to be destroyed by taxation. Then let us ask what is the need of imposing a tax at all if there is no revenue necessity and the business is not such an infamous one as to invite destruction by means of the taxing power? In this connection, I will call the attention of the House to this point, that while it is not proper in the discussion of tax measures to consider whether the imposition of the tax will encourage or discourage an industry at the expense of or to the enrichment of others, yet when we consider a new departure in our system of government, then it does become us to inquire in what manner this tax will bear upon the class that will be obliged to sustain it. No one will think it desirable to impose a tax upon those virtues which have helped to create and maintain in its glory the American Republic. It would be a tax upon economy, a tax upon frugality, a tax upon self-denial, because the premiums that maintain these policies are taken weekly or monthly out of the earnings of the breadwinner who hopes to create a fund by his self-denial which will insure his family against want when he leaves the scene of his mortal career. I will not willingly inflict a tax upon that class of persons, Mr. Chairman.

Now, then, we come to the next question, and that is whether it shall be submitted to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and here, it seems to me, the decision becomes more difficult. For while there have been a number of decisions by the courts which indicate that insurance can not be properly classed as a subject of commerce, the belief is growing that if the Congress of the United States should deal with that subject in the exercise of the power over interstate and foreign commerce, in some manner the Supreme Court might follow the Administration as it did in the insular cases. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But let us ask, Is it wise to submit it to that committee? I, for one, Mr. Chairman, would not like to see the definition of the term "commerce" broadened by a decision of the Supreme Court. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Commerce, in my judgment, is a term that never was framed to include such operations as the writing of insurance. I believe that "commerce" ought not to include the ordinary business contracts between individuals, and I trust that the day is far away when the word "commerce" shall be so defined as to include every possible business transaction between citizens of different States. I shall regret very much, as an attorney, to find that the Congress of the United States is legislating as to the size of my fee if I undertake to try a case in a court in the State of Missouri for a citizen of that State. I think it will be sad indeed if the Congress of the United States should go into the business of regulating the fees of a Rhode Island physician who might come to cure a citizen of Massachusetts of a cancer. But if the Supreme Court declares that commerce is insurance, I do not see why the reasoning of that decision may not be carried to the regulation of fees of physicians and attorneys who happen to practice in States other than those States in which they are domiciled themselves. I believe that the Supreme Court has gone far enough in extending the definition of the word "commerce" in the lottery cases—the case of Champion v. Ames—and I, for one, would not desire to see it carried further. I wish to add that I for one was in harmony with the views of the four justices who were in a minority in that case.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is really sought by this proposed legislation is the redress of legal and moral wrongs. I say, in answer to the demand for that legislation, that the legal wrongs may be fully dealt with by the legislatures of the States in which those legal wrongs are practiced. I say also that if this is an attempt to remedy a moral wrong that there is no power in the State legislatures or the national legislature to reach that kind of an abuse. You can not legislate morality into a board of directors of high finance sitting in Wall street any more than you can legislate thirst out of a citizen of Iowa or Kansas or Maine. [Laughter.] No power in this Government is adequate to accomplish moral ends. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that there is sufficient power in the great State of New York to deal with this form of abuse of trust funds. The investigation which has disclosed the scandals to us is not yet terminated. We have no right to predict that the legislature of the State of New York can not deal adequately with the abuses with which this investigation has made us familiar.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed, as I said in the beginning, to any extension of the Federal power over presently recognized subjects of State legislation, except in self-defense. I do not believe this constitutes one of those cases. I for one will never subscribe to government ownership of any public utility until it is first demonstrated that abuses have crept in which can not be dealt with in any other way than through the medium of government ownership. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When that comes I will be ready to accept it, but will do it with a full knowledge that I am departing from a fundamental doctrine of the Democratic party, which is that individual initiative should be encouraged, that the domain of private enterprise should be enlarged, and that the domain of government action should not be increased at the expense of individual enterprise. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think that the House is to be congratulated that history is repeating itself somewhat in that, as in the days of old, the questions dealt with in the President's message are referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration and general debate. In the message that has been sent to Congress by the President he has dealt with many subjects, and I think in the main he has handled them with great ability. Some fifty-odd propositions are treated by him in his message. The debates in the committee have been of wide latitude. Briefly referring to some of the matters treated by the President, I think it is to be conceded that he had in mind the safety and welfare of the laboring classes when writing his message. He deals with the subject of safety appliances on our railroads, showing his solicitude for the safety and individual welfare of those engaged in this hazardous business. He also treats of the hours of employment for railroad employees. For this I applaud him, for the reason that these people need the protection of the law, and when the highest official in all the land speaks for their welfare he is to be commended in the highest terms.

But the subject of debate here, while it has been wide in latitude, has been mainly confined to the proposition of controlling insurance. I have listened to this debate with a great deal of interest, and have been hoping and endeavoring to enlarge my knowledge, limited as it is, upon this subject.

I have waited in vain for some one to come forward with a definite, a clear, and a fixed proposition, one which would solve this question and give to this House and give to the people of the United States relief from the evils which they suffer to-day in the matter of insurance abuses. It has been urged that this is a question for consideration by various committees. It seems that there is no agreement as to the proper committee. I remember the able argument of the gentleman from Iowa, that the subject is one to be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The House was told that the questions involved were so great, they were so immense, that notwithstanding the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has ruled time and again that insurance is not interstate commerce, that notwithstanding this, that possibly if the Supreme Court had another opportunity and the matter was presented to them as a question of "immense interest" they might—perhaps they might—change their minds.

Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who believe in law and order. I prefer to believe that when courts of this country correctly construe the Constitution that it stand. I believe that the Supreme Court decisions that have been given to us, holding that insurance is not interstate commerce, will always be, as now, the law of the land. I do not think the question open to disscussion. However, if it is, it can only be in this way, as has been suggested here—that the Congress pass an act treating insurance as interstate commerce and give the court another chance. But if the Supreme Court is going to stand by the decisions they have made to the effect that insurance is not interstate commerce, then I submit that the only remedies are, first, for the party in power to pass the act as suggested, and then amend the Supreme Court to decide the law in accordance with the wishes of the majority.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is no man in this House who would dare to take that stand. It is revolutionary and one not to be contended for a single instant. So that I submit it is not a proper subject for reference to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, for the reason that the question involved is not one of interstate commerce. But it is argued that it might be referred to the Post-Office Committee, for the reason that insurance companies use the mails.

As to this I want to say briefly that perhaps there would be no serious objection to a law being passed by Congress providing that all insurance companies using the mails of the United States should submit to an ample, complete, and full investigation by the Department of Commerce and Labor whenever it was deemed necessary. That might give some publicity at times when otherwise we would not have it. This is about as far as Congress should go. I want to state frankly that I am opposed to Federal control of insurance. I do not believe that the States that created and gave life and being to insurance companies should be deprived of supreme control of insurance companies. Is there any necessity for it? I see none. Why, it is said we have had great revelations—and they are great—of fraud, of thieving, of rascality, of knavery on the part of the great insurance organizations of this country. This is true.

But I wish to ask the committee, is it possible that the American people have reached a point in the downward scale when they are neither able nor willing to right wrongs that they suffer from at home, when they have the power in the States to correct the abuses there? Will they not do it? I submit that they will. Take the State of New York to-day, the home of the three greatest life-insurance companies in the world. The life-insurance commissioner of that State has, in my opinion, for years and years neglected his duty in a shameful manner, in a manner that is practically criminal. Had he performed his duty in the years that have gone, the question to-day so much agitating this country, and being debated in this House from day to day, would not be heard of, in all probability. But notwithstanding the fact that he did not investigate and keep up with the wrongdoings of these companies, light has come on their evil deeds, and to-day we find a Republican State legislature in New York State—that is, Republican in majority—have appointed a committee, which committee is now investigating this matter, and they have for attorney a prominent Republican of the city of New York. That committee is doing its full duty, and bringing to light the wrongdoing of life-insurance companies. That committee has shown to the world that the Hydes, the McCalls, and the McCurdys are not what they pretended to be. That, on the contrary, when their dues are meted out to them stripes will be in order.

But something has been said here about the courts of New York City, where if any prosecutions are to be had they must be had. In that city the chief prosecuting officer is Mr. Jerome, the most fearless, the most independent, and, I believe, one of the most patriotic men in the United States, and he has promised the country that he will give to these people a day in court, and that if he is able to do it he will put stripes upon each and every one of them. So I say there is no great and crying necessity for Congress to be unduly excited, or for the people of the country to come here and knock at the doors of Congress and demand relief on the ground that they can obtain it in no other place. On the contrary, the relief is at home. So I submit, Mr. Chairman, that when this question is considered in its broadest sense and in its narrowest sense after all it is a question for the States. It is one that the States can deal with. It is one that the States should deal with, and, in my opinion, the Congress has no right to say that they will take supreme control of insurance. We all know what that means.

Congress, for instance, has supreme control in the matter of taxation for the support of the National Government. Taxation carries with it the power to destroy. There is no reason, as I stated before, why insurance should be taxed, and I believe that the majority of this House feels that we can not support the taxing of insurance companies as a general proposition. Insurance is no more interstate commerce than is the case of a man in Maine borrowing money from a bank in the State of Iowa. So that while we may consider this matter here, while we may provide for more extended examinations and publicity, I think that is as far as Congress should go; I believe it is as far as it can go. There is no power anywhere to make insurance a matter of interstate commerce. The country will never demand or submit to making it a subject of taxation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did I understand the gentleman to say that he thought Congress has the power to make insurance commerce?

Mr. FINLEY. No; I did not say that. I said I did not think it could.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Can Congress make commerce out of that which is not commerce?

Mr. FINLEY. No.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then my friend was really making fun of the proposition?

Mr. FINLEY. I supposed I was treating it with some degree of seriousness. So, Mr. Chairman, if it is contended here that something must be done, in addition to the powers held and exercised by the States, I believe it might help to a limited extent to give additional publicity to the acts and doings of the insurance corporations. But where does this demand for Federal control come from?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We have a bureau here that has the power of going around and begging for information.

Mr. FINLEY. Yes; the Bureau of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is practically what Mr. Garfield's bureau does.

Mr. FINLEY. Yes; I so understand.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just exactly as I contended here when we established that little concern without any teeth. I think I used that expression at the time.

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, he goes around and he asks for this information, and they give him such as they have——

Mr. FINLEY. Such as they wish.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Such as they wish; and they give out the gilt-edged information, as it were, and put that into his hands, but they do not let him into the rottenness, if there is any. The result is that he publishes what you might term the golden pages of their history; and thus the community is lulled into a state of false security by not having all the facts, which facts we can not obtain because insurance is not commerce.

Mr. FINLEY. I suggest to my friend that it would be against human nature for them to unveil their rascality to Mr. Garfield or anybody else.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But when we undertake to publish the information we should publish the whole of it.

Mr. FINLEY. Yes; all of it. I stated that in my judgment that was as far as Congress could go or should go, to provide that insurance companies that use the mail should be subject to an examination by the Bureau of Commerce and Labor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, who is it that comes here and demands this all-powerful Federal control in the matter of insurance? Is it the people of the United States? I have heard no clamor in my part of the country to that effect. Is it the business men of the country? I do not remember that one of any prominence or that any combined interest has made any such demand. But we have a demand, Mr. Chairman, and that demand comes from the insurance magnates themselves. It comes from the McCurdys and the McCalls. They are the people who wish for it, and why? They think and they know that with one supreme control, and that control Federal, removed as far from the people as possible, they would not stand one chance in a hundred of being exposed in their wrongdoing, in their rascality.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. On page 13 of the Garfield report he says:

A long line of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, commencing with Paul v. Virginia (8 Wall., 168), established the legal proposition that insurance was not interstate commerce in any of its forms—fire, life, or marine—as presented to the court. This line of decisions has been further supported by the uniform holdings of State courts.

If this legal proposition is irrevocably settled, the powers of the Commissioner relative to insurance are purely of a statistical, voluntary, noncompulsory nature. He may collect, compile, and publish such information as may be voluntarily furnished to him, but he can not compel the production of such information, nor would he be justified in recommending any Federal legislation directed at Federal control of insurance.

Now, I forget exactly when the Bureau of Corporations was formed.

Mr. FINLEY. About three years ago, as I remember.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, the Commissioner states that he has visited several States, and among others the State of New York. And yet he did not find a single McCurdy or McCall, nor did he find any of the rottenness that has been exposed in those companies.

Mr. FINLEY. Oh, there is no question about that. I am clear in my own mind that the term "commerce" as used in the Constitution of the United States relates to trade of commodities as a general proposition. But before giving supreme control of insurance companies to the United States, depriving the States of that power, I think we should hesitate. When I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania yesterday to what extent an act of Congress could take away from the States the control of insurance companies, I hoped for an answer and he has promised to give it to us, but, Mr. Chairman, in all the debate that has taken place, no one has undertaken to answer that proposition.

I am unwilling to take from the States any of the powers reserved to them; on the contrary, these powers should be emphasized on every proper occasion.

It seems to me that we are in a wide field where there is ample room for discussion in a general way, but when it comes to doing something, when it comes to putting your finger on the exact and proper relief, no one has come forward in this House to offer it. I believe that Congress should do practically nothing; at least, no more than I have intimated. Now, in addition to the fact that insurance is not commerce—consequently the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is without jurisdiction—I may add that if this committee performs all the work cut out for it at this session of Congress, not only by the President of the United States, but by the American people in demanding relief in the matter of regulating the railroads in transportation charges, it will have all the work it can possibly do, and when that work is well done, as I confidently hope and expect that it will be done, I believe that committee will not have the time to even investigate this matter and report back to the House, as I believe it would report, that they had no jurisdiction of the subject, because insurance is not interstate commerce.

So that, Mr. Chairman, if this matter is to be investigated at all by a committee of this House, if the President's message is to be referred to any particular committee, I think it should be referred to the Judiciary Committee for investigation and report. The President of the United States himself raises the question whether or not Congress has the power to legislate. He does not state specifically that Congress can legislate. It is a question whether or not it can do anything. There is no bill before the House; only the President's message. As I see it, the proper course would seem to be, if this part of the message is to be sent to any committee, send it to the Judiciary Committee for report. That will not prohibit the introduction of bills. Bills of various character on this subject, as I understand, have already been introduced into the Senate and House.

So that I think the debate here has served a wise and useful purpose, and I for one am glad to see the House of Representatives return to the old practice of placing the President's message on the Calendar, and then when the House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to debate it and consider it, and I am sure that good will result. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The resolution was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House resolution 42 and had come to no resolution thereon.

DIRECTORS COLUMBIA HOSPITAL FOR WOMEN.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of the following Members as directors of the Columbia Hospital for Women:

Mr. BARCHFELD and Mr. LIVINGSTON.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. CAMPBELL to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Patrick Conlin, Fifty-sixth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS BY COMMITTEE ON INSULAR AFFAIRS.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Insular Affairs be authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents for the use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by the said committee during the Fifty-ninth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution which has just been reported? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

CLERKS AND EMPLOYEES OF THE AGE OF SEVENTY YEARS OR MORE.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested to cause to be prepared, as soon as may be practicable, and to communicate to the House, information as to the number of clerks and other civil employees in the classified service, male or female, in each of the Executive Departments of the Government, and in the Government Printing Office, and under the Smithsonian Institution, and in the aggregate in the city of Washington, who have reached the age of 70 years or more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution which has just been reported?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not object, but I suppose that resolution would ordinarily go to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say that I have consulted with my colleagues on the Committee on Appropriations, whom I could not see before offering the resolution. This information is desired for the information of the subcommittee having in charge the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill before commencing the preparation of that bill.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] if he has any objection to adding to that the request that we obtain information as to what States the different employees referred to are from?

Mr. TAWNEY. That information the committee will obtain from the heads of the departments when they are before the committee.

Mr. FINLEY. And the State they are from?

Mr. TAWNEY. The committee will obtain that information, but what we want to get at first is the number in each department. Then the Committee on Appropriations will investigate the matter further when the heads of the different departments are brought before it in the preparation of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire whether this is a matter that can be answered within the time necessary to prepare the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. I have no doubt that it can be.

Mr. MANN. Well, I understand that we issue a Blue Book once in two years, because it takes a very long time to issue it, and my information has been to the effect that the Blue Book just about to be issued for the year 1907 has just been made up. That is a very long document if that is what we want.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; we do not ask for the Blue Book. We are simply asking the President of the United States to inform the House, or to cause information to be collected by his Cabinet officers and the heads of departments, as to the number in the service who have reached the age of 70 years or over. It is limited to those who are 70 years of age and over.

Mr. MANN. I did not understand that. We have had that several times, and I would say to the gentleman that if the Committee on Appropriations waits to make up its bill for that information it will be chasing rainbows sure, because that information has been before this Congress repeatedly, and no action ever has been taken upon it and no action will be taken now.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think the gentleman is mistaken about its ever having been presented to the House, except in the Dockery Commission report some twelve years ago.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, it has been presented to the House recently. The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service reported a bill into the House for the purpose of taking up this very question, which never has been acted upon in past Congresses and probably never will be acted upon, and while I am very glad to have the gentleman get the information I trust he will not delay the House in passing appropriation bills in order that something may be done about superannuation.

Mr. TAWNEY. There will be no delay on that account.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman why he wants this information?

Mr. TAWNEY. We want this information for the purpose of knowing to what extent Congress is obliged to appropriate for the payment of salaries of clerks who have reached the age of 70 years and over. Under our civil-service laws there is ample opportunity for getting into the service, but none apparently for getting out of it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, does the gentleman propose to report here or discuss here a proposition to pension these people in order to get them out?

Mr. TAWNEY. Not under any circumstances.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do we not already know how much we pay people of 70 years of age and over?

Mr. TAWNEY. The only question involved here, I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee, is whether or not the House and the country should have this information. After the information has been obtained it will then be a matter for the committee and the House to determine what use shall be made of it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the resolution will be considered as agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed:

The Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a report by the Secretary of State submitting a claim of the Great Northwestern Telegraph Company, of Canada, on account of losses sustained through the fouling of their telegraph cable by the U. S. S. Essex on July 17, 1904.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 16, 1905.

REPRINT OF HOUSE BILLS NOS. 285 AND 286.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following request, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ROBERTS requests that House bills Nos. 285 and 286, relating to the gypsy and brown-tail moths, be reprinted, the original print having become exhausted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the request is granted.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet on Monday, December 18, 1905, at 12 o'clock meridian.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting an estimate of appropriation for rent of quarters for shipping commissioner at San Francisco, Cal.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for support of the military prison at Fort Leavenworth—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, submitting estimates of appropriation for furniture, etc., for public buildings—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting papers, including draft of a bill, relating to the relief of Capt. William N. Hughes, United States Army, retired—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting resolutions of the Association of Military Surgeons, relating to the canteen—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a favorable recommendation, a communication from the Surgeon-General of the Army relating to amendment of the law as to contracts for medical and hospital supplies—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Buffalo breakwater, New York—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed, with illustration.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. BRICK, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 99) to aid the Council City and Solomon River Railroad Company, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 6); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BURTON of Delaware: A bill (H. R. 8747) providing for the construction of the extension of the breakwater of the harbor of refuge, Delaware Bay, Delaware, and making an appropriation therefor—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. BARTHOLDT: A bill (H. R. 8748) relating to the band of the United States Marine Corps, and to competition of naval and military bands with civilian musicians—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. McMORRAN: A bill (H. R. 8749) to refund a fine of $200 imposed upon and paid by Charles H. Marsden, owner of the tug Owen—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. GAINES of West Virginia: A bill (H. R. 8750) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building thereon at Hinton, in the State of West Virginia—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HAYES: A bill (H. R. 8751) to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery in the district of Alaska—to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. SMITH of Texas: A bill (H. R. 8752) to provide for the enlargement of Fort Bliss, near El Paso, Tex.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. Mr. MARSHALL: A bill (H. R. 8753) to appropriate $60,000 for necessary expense of investigation of methods of dry-land farming suited to the arid and semiarid regions—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. McCREARY of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 8754) providing for a site and building for a custom-house in the city of Philadelphia, Pa.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. MEYER: A bill (H. R. 8755) to erect a monument on the Chalmette battle ground, in St. Bernard Parish, La.—to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. STERLING: A bill (H. R. 8756) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue duplicate gold certificates in lieu of ones lost or destroyed—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HAYES: A bill (H. R. 8757) to amend section 3255 of the Revised Statutes of the United States—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

MONDAY, December 18, 1905.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

SHELBY M. CULLOM, a Senator from the State of Illinois, appeared in his seat to-day.

THE JOURNAL.

The Secretary read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am not sure that I correctly heard what the Secretary read. Does the Journal state that I withdrew an amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yes; that the amendment was withdrawn by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. No; that is not the fact. I acquiesced in the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] as a substitute for it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would then ask what became of the Senator's amendment?

Mr. BACON. The amendment of the Senator from Maine was acquiesced in as a substitute for it. It was not in the nature of a withdrawal of the amendment. A withdrawal of the amendment would indicate an abandonment of the purpose. I do not think the phraseology is correct. There was no withdrawal of the amendment. There was the modification proposed by the Senator from Maine in practically the same language, inserting it in a different place. The RECORD will show that in the debate the attitude assumed was simply this: I acquiesced in the suggestion of the Senator from Maine that practically the same amendment in the same language should be inserted by interlineation.

Mr. HALE rose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. There is so much noise——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. HALE. There is so much noise and confusion that none of us on this side can hear the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I will state the question which has arisen.

The Journal states that I withdrew the amendment which I had offered. I say that puts me in an improper attitude. The amendment was not withdrawn, but I acquiesced in the suggestion of the Senator from Maine that language practically the same should be inserted in an existing section. That was done by him, with my consent, and my amendment was, therefore, no further pressed. But there was no withdrawal of it; and the statement that it was withdrawn indicates an abandonment of the purpose, which is not true. In other words, the same end was accomplished, in my opinion, by the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, and it was more acceptable to the Senator from Iowa, and for that reason I yielded to what I said was the superior judgment of the committee. It is more a matter of form than of substance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The fact is that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine was adopted in lieu of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. I am perfectly willing for that so to appear.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The fact is that the amendment of the Senator from Georgia was not adopted.

Mr. BACON. And was not withdrawn, but the amendment of the Senator from Maine was accepted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment was accepted as a substitute for it, in fact.

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir; that is the fact.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal will so show the fact.

DELAWARE RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, in response to a resolution of March 3, 1905, relative to the estimate of the cost of deepening the channel in the Delaware River, Pennsylvania, from Allegheny avenue, Philadelphia, to deep water in Delaware Bay, stating that in accordance with section 2 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1905, no estimate for a 35-foot channel in the Delaware River has been ordered by Congress and no such estimate has ever been made, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MEDICAL AND HOSPITAL SUPPLIES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Surgeon-General of the Army recommending that section 3732 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to include medical and hospital supplies in the excepted clause; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FINDINGS OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of facts filed by the court in the cause of James M. Stephenson v. The United States; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

THE ARMY CANTEEN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a certified copy of resolutions adopted by the Association of Military Surgeons of the United States regarding the reestablishment of the Army canteen; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 480) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, and making appropriation for isthmian canal construction, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HEPBURN, Mr. PAYNE, and Mr. LIVINGSTON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 48) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1905, on the 20th day of said month, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CULLOM presented memorials of Rock Island Division, No. 106, of Moline, and of Jay Gould Division, No. 127, of Danville, all of the Order of Railway Conductors, in the State of Illinois, and of the Southeastern Millers' Association of Nashville, Tenn., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

STATE OF WASHINGTON,
Office of the Secretary of State:

I, Sam H. Nichols, secretary of state of the State of Washington, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the annexed copy of senate joint memorial No. 7, relative to proposed recognition of services rendered by certain old soldiers, with the original enrolled copy of said joint memorial filed in this office on the 8th day of March, A. D. 1905, and now remaining on file herein, and find the same to be a full, true, and correct copy of said original, and of the whole thereof, together with all official indorsements thereon.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Washington. Done at the capitol, at Olympia, this 8th day of March, A. D. 1905.

[SEAL.]

SAM H. NICHOLS,
Secretary of State.

Senate joint memorial No. 7.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the ninth legislative assembly of the State of Washington:

Whereas the legislative assembly of the Territory of Washington memoralized Congress by joint resolution passed January 24, 1857, and instructed therein their Delegate in Congress to exert his influence to procure the passage of an act by Congress, granting to Sergt. Mathew Kelley, Privates William Houser, Mathew Roach, Jeremiah Sheridan, Frederick Bernaur, Hiram Smiley, and Robert Williams, of Company H, Fourth Infantry, as a mark of commendation for their efficient aid in protecting the citizens who escaped the massacre at the Cascades, Washington Territory, on the 26th–27th of March, 1856, and their gallant conduct in defending the blockhouse at that place against the combined attacks for three days of several hundred Indians, the extra pay of $2 per month as was allowed during the Mexican war to such noncommissioned officers and privates as received certificates of merit for distinguished services; and

Whereas many valuable lives were saved by the successful stand made there, and the recapture of the portage was also aided by this defense; and

Whereas said Delegate in Congress failed to exert his influence, as instructed by the legislative assembly, to procure the passage of an act by Congress granting to each of the gallant men herein named a certificate of merit for their gallantry and distinguished services; and

Whereas said service received merited recognition in paragraph 4 of General Orders, No. 14, of 1857, of the Army, as follows, to wit:

General Orders,
No. 14. HEADQUARTERS, NEW YORK, November 13, 1857.

Paragraph 4. In March, 1856, Sergeant Kelley, Company H, Fourth Infantry, with eight men gallantly defended a small blockhouse and protected the public property at the Cascades, Washington Territory, for two days against a body of fifty Indians. He had one man—Private L. Rooney—killed, and two privates—F. Bernaur and O. McManus—wounded, the latter since dead of his wounds.

By command of Brevet Lieutenant-General Scott:

IRVIN MCDOWELL,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

And whereas more than forty-eight years have passed without granting any substantial recognition of the services of these courageous and patriotic soldiers, it in no wise lessens or changes the merited obligation on the part of the Government toward said named gallant soldiers: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate of the State of Washington (the house of representatives concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to exert their influence to secure the passage by Congress of an act granting to Robert Williams, sergeant of ordnance, United States Army, retired, and his other comrades named herein, if surviving, a certificate of merit for distinguished services and heroic conduct on that memorable and historic occasion referred to by the Lieutenant-General of the American Army, and that the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish a certified copy of this concurrent memorial to the President of the United States, President of the United States Senate, Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress. And your memorialists will ever pray.

Passed the senate February 24, 1905.

CHARLES E. COON,
President of the Senate.

Passed the house March 4, 1905.

JOSEPH G. MEGLER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

(Indorsed:) Filed in the office of the secretary of state this 8th day of March, A. D. 1905.

SAM H. NICHOLS, Secretary of State.

INTERNATIONAL RAILWAY.

Mr. CULLOM. I present a letter from Mr. Hinton Rowan Helper, of Washington, D. C., relative to the construction of an international railway through the three Americas. I move that the communication be printed as a document, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED RECIPROCITY POLICY.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I see by the morning papers that I am deluged with petitions on the question of reciprocity. That is not true. The fact is that I have no petitions on that subject. A further fact, however, is that I have received a very large number of personal letters, which I did not think it proper to file in the Senate, although they were on the general subject and proper letters.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 312) to extend the time for the completion of a bridge across the Missouri River at Yankton, S. Dak., reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 955) authorizing the city of Nome, a municipal corporation organized and existing under chapter 21, title 3, of an act of Congress approved June 6, 1900, entitled "An act making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes," to construct a free bridge across the Snake River at Nome city, in the Territory of Alaska, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1160) to correct the military record of John McKinnon, alias John Mack, to request that the committee be relieved from the further consideration of the bill; and they recommend that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. It refers to a man who has served in both the Navy and the Army, but I understand the alleged desertion to have been from the naval service.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming asks that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GAMBLE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 51) to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 55) for the widening of Bladensburg road, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 68) for the widening of a section of Columbia road east of Sixteenth street, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. ALLISON. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably, without amendment, the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives providing for a holiday recess, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Thursday, December 21, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian, Thursday, January 4, 1906.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

CHARLES L. EATON AND OTHERS.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. LODGE on the 16th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Charles L. Eaton, Alonzo B. Eaton, and Edward H. Eaton, only children of Alonzo J. Eaton, late a member of the Capitol police force, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his demise, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McCUMBER introduced a bill (S. 1953) granting an increase of pension to Charles M. Benson; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 2188) granting to the city of Durango, in the State of Colorado, certain lands therein described for water reservoirs.

Mr. DUBOIS. I would ask that the title of the homestead bill introduced by the Senator from Colorado may be again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill providing for free homesteads in the Ute Indian Reservation in Colorado.

Mr. DUBOIS. Has that bill been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs or the Committee on Public Lands?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TELLER. I think that is the proper place for the bill to go, but if the Senator desires that it shall go to the Committee on Indian Affairs I have no objection.

Mr. DUBOIS. If the question of Indian title is involved, I think the bill should go to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but I have no special desire about the matter.

Mr. TELLER. I will say that there is really no question of Indian title concerned. The Indians will get a dollar and a quarter an acre whether the people who go in shall take the homesteads by homestead or by preemption. That is the treaty with them. The bill does not affect the treaty, but it is only a question of whether the Government will buy these lands and pay the Indians for them and give them as homesteads to actual settlers. That is all there is about it.

Mr. DUBOIS. Very well; let the bill go to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TELLER. I think that is the correct reference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reference heretofore ordered will stand.

A bill (S. 2202) for the relief of the estate of Dr. Bailey Shumate;

A bill (S. 2203) for the relief of Lettie Myers; and

A bill (by request) (S. 2204) for the relief of Emma C. Franner, George W. Seaton, Hiram K. Seaton, Howard Seaton, Mary Seaton, Blanche Seaton, George W. Taylor, Edward Taylor, and Catharine Pomeroy.

Mr. MARTIN introduced a bill (S. 2205) for the relief of the estate of Mary A. Gough, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HALE introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

A bill (S. 2206) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the Hospital Corps of the Navy of the United States, and to define its duties and regulate its pay;

A bill (S. 2207) for the establishment and organization of a nurse corps of trained women nurses in the United States Navy; and

A bill (S. 2208) authorizing the appointment of dental surgeons in the Navy.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 2209) granting a pension to Milford W. Oxley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 2210) granting a pension to Cynthia L. Allen; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PETTUS introduced a bill (S. 2211) for the relief of Mitsul Bussan Kaisha; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MONEY introduced a bill (S. 2212) for the relief of Francisco Krebs; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DRYDEN introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 11) relating to the wearing of badges by military societies; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GAMBLE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 12) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish a condemned cannon to the board of regents of the University of South Dakota, at Vermilion, S. Dak., to be placed on the campus of said institution as a memorial to students of said university who served in the Spanish-American war; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 13) authorizing the Secretary of War to award the Congressional medal of honor to Roe Reisinger; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WILLIAM HARRINGTON—PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PENROSE, it was Ordered, That papers inadvertently referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to accompany the bill (S. 1589) to correct the military record of William Harlan, be withdrawn and referred to the Committee on Pensions, to be filed with the bill (S. 1632) granting an increase of pension to William Harrington.

NATIONAL FOREST RESERVE IN WHITE MOUNTAINS.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are numerous calls for the bill (S. 34) for the purchase of a national forest reserve in the White Mountains, and the present supply is exhausted. I ask that 1,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the document room of the Senate.

There being no objection, the order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 1,000 additional copies of the bill (S. 34) for the purchase of a national forest reserve in the White Monutains, to be known as the "National White Mountain Forest Reserve," be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the assistant clerk to the Committee on the Judiciary be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $2,000 per annum until otherwise ordered.

ELIZA A. LEMON.

Mr. SCOTT submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Eliza A. Lemon, widow of H. H. Lemon, late a member of the Capitol police force, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his demise, said sum to be considered as including funeral allowances and all other allowances.

UNITED STATES DEPOSITORIES.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate the name and location of each and every national bank designated as a United States depository, together with the total amount of money deposited in each of said banks by the United States during the fiscal years ended June 30, 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, and 1905.

PANAMA CANAL APPROPRIATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 480) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, and making appropriation for isthmian canal construction, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. TELLER were appointed.

STANDING AND SELECT COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. HALE. Are resolutions now in order, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no other bills or joint resolutions, the introduction of concurrent and other resolutions is in order.

Mr. HALE. I offer the order which I send to the desk, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That so much of Rule XXIV of the Senate as provides for appointment of the standing and other committees of the Senate by ballot be suspended.

Mr. HALE. I ask that that order be passed on at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the order proposed by the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none.

The order was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Now let the accompanying resolution be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the following shall constitute the standing and select committees of the Senate of the Fifty-ninth Congress:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I rise to inquire if every Senator on the roll has been assigned to a committee, and if not, why not?

Mr. HALE. Yes; I think, undoubtedly, Mr. President, every Senator upon the roll has been assigned upon different committees by the committees from both sides to make up the committees, with the exception of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BURTON], who himself desired—and made his wish known to the committee having the matter in charge—that during the pendency of examination into the case against him no assignment be made him upon any committee; and upon that no assignment was made in his case. That is the only exception.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it is an exceedingly disagreeable duty to raise a question as to the rights of any Senator in this body, but I am not able to see how the Senate can leave a Senator upon the roll of the Senate and still not assign him to a committee. So long as a man is a Senator he ought to be permitted to exercise his privileges as a Senator and he ought to be required to perform the duties of a Senator.

I sympathize with the delicacy of the task which the committee had before it. I also appreciate the force of the argument that when a question affecting the character and conduct of a Senator is under investigation by the courts it might be well for the Senate to withhold any judgment or proceeding until the final disposition of the criminal charge in the courts of the country. But, sir, there is another side to that question. Whenever a Senator can not come to his seat in this Chamber, can not attend the meetings of our committees, and can not answer to his name on the roll call, the effect of it is to deprive the State which he represents of at least a part of its representation in this body.

I believe the rule ought to be that when a charge affecting the fitness of a Senator to continue in this body is made in such a way as to challenge the attention of the Senate, a committee ought to be appointed, or the matter ought to be referred to some standing committee of the Senate, and they ought to report without delay upon the right of that Senator to continue as a member of this body. If he is found unfit, the Senate owes it to the State which he represents, the Senate owes it to the country which it represents, and the Senate, most of all, owes it to itself to dispose of that question without the least delay.

I do not concede to any court the right to decide who is entitled to a seat in this body. The Constitution commits that to us in the first instance and in the last instance. We are to judge of their election and qualifications when they come; and, under our power of expulsion, we are to judge how long they may remain.

The rule is different here from that which prevails in the courts. There, as a safeguard for the liberty of the citizen, he must have his guilt established beyond a reasonable doubt; here the rule ought to be that he must free himself from all appearance of wrongdoing beyond reasonable doubt.

Mr. President, this is not the time to discuss this question on its merits. I simply embrace the opportunity to declare my belief that the Senate should determine this question without waiting longer on the courts.

We are already in a most awkward attitude. The death of a member of this body has not yet been announced to it. His successor will soon appear at that bar to take upon himself the obligations of the office, and yet the credentials of that successor will be the first formal notice the Senate will have received of the death of the predecessor.

Mr. President, we can not afford to be too tender with these questions. I would be the last man here or elsewhere to stain an honorable name by even proposing an unjust inquiry; but Senators who do behave themselves ought not to rest under the shadow of a suspicion cast upon the Senate by those who do not behave themselves.

Without any formal motion I protest against recognizing the right of a Senator to remain upon the roll and yet denying him the right of an assignment to a committee.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] that this is not the time to discuss the fundamental question as to membership in this body. The resolution before the Senate does not deal with that question in any way.

In doing the business of the Senate the important task of arranging and rearranging committees is intrusted to a select committee raised by the conferences of the two organizations, who go over the whole subject-matter and report to their respective parties. The final report of the two committees is embodied in a resolution such as I have submitted. It is invariably the habit and the method of doing business that Senators' wishes respecting committees are consulted; not that every Senator has his way, but if a Senator expresses his desire to retire from a committee, I have never known an exception to the rule of letting him retire. What is true about a Senator on one committee is true about a Senator who is on several committees; but in this case the Senator from Kansas, still a member of the body, still upon the roll, to be dealt with not here, but in any resolution that may subsequently be introduced by any Senator, if he should so choose, expressed his desire—from commendable reasons, I should say—in the exercise of some self-restraint and delicacy, that during the pendency of the legal proceedings against him, while he was the subject of the action of a court where no final result had been reached, that he be left off of all committees. Had he selected one committee or two or three committees, as other Senators did, that would have presented one question; but the only question presented was, Should the committee assign him to places when he desired not to be so assigned?

We have no power to enforce either attendance or service upon committees. If this resolve had placed the Senator from Kansas upon any or all of his old committees, he could have declined service the next day, and the Senate, as it always does, would have accepted and would have carried out his wishes, and the places would have been left vacant, to be filled otherwise. The committee thought it was not dealing with the great question of membership—was not touching upon it—but simply upon the convenience and business of the Senate, in agreeing to his wishes as communicated to it by Mr. BURTON, and left him off. That is all there is to it.

As I said at the beginning, I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Texas that this is not the time to discuss the other fundamental matter. Therefore I shall take no more of the time of the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, this is rather a delicate question to discuss pending the consideration of the case of the Senator from Kansas in the court of the United States. The Senator from Kansas is still a member of this body, and so far as the action of the Senate is concerned he stands exactly as he did before there was any complaint made against him by a grand jury.

I agree with the Senator from Texas that this is the place in the first instance where this question should be determined as to his guilt or innocence. Unquestionably when complaint was made against the Senator by a grand jury we could have taken cognizance of the case and proceeded to examine it and determine whether or not there was sufficient cause for his expulsion. I believe, although I do not speak with absolute certainty, that we have pursued the same course that has been pursued in other countries, as in the country from which we received most of laws and customs—Great Britain. There a charge of this kind is not taken up by Parliament until such time as the courts, if the courts have jurisdiction of the case at all, have decided it.

I can see a good deal of difficulty if we should take up the case before the courts have decided it and the courts should decide it differently from what we decided, especially if after we have acquitted the courts should convict. Then certainly we should be in a very embarrassing situation. So the case, I believe, being one without precedent in the history of the Senate, as I understand, is certainly a very embarrassing one. How far we should be governed by the courts is a question which addresses itself to the conscience of every Senator.

The Senator from Texas said it is our prerogative to determine whether the Senator is guilty or not. Undoubtedly, and it is one we can not afford to surrender and one we must always maintain. I refer to our right, and not that of any court, to determine whether or not a man is entitled to sit in this body. It is the only way that the Senate can be legally maintained, and, what is of equal importance, the only way the reputation of the Senate can be maintained in the judgment of the country. If a court has a right to convict a Senator here and there and practically remove him from the Senate, you can see very readily that there may be times when there would be danger to the Senate. If, on the other hand, we declare that if a court acquits a man that shall be an end to the controversy and we shall be compelled to accept him here, we may be compelled to sit with Senators whose characters we despise and whose characters the public at large distrust.

A controversy of this kind coming before the Senate puts every Senator upon his conscience. Suppose a Senator is convicted? Suppose that I, as a Senator, do not believe, after acquainting myself with all the facts, that that is a legal and proper conviction? Suppose I believe, on the contrary, that it is an unjust and wicked conviction? What am I to do? What is my duty? Must I follow the courts? I do not know, because there is no precedent, what the Senate will do. I know what I would do. If I did not believe the man convicted by a jury was guilty of the crime with which he was charged, I would never vote to expel him from this body, no matter what public sentiment and popular opinion might be. I have known men—perhaps not in this body—but I have known men charged with offenses against the law, and serious offenses against the law, acquitted, when, in my judgment, they were guilty. On the other hand, I have known in my practice as a lawyer men whom I believed were guiltless of crime convicted by the courts. So I say this is the place to try these questions, and we certainly should not surrender that right nor should we be in haste. If we should take up the case pending its consideration in the courts, we might be charged, and properly charged, with having unduly and improperly prejudiced the defendant in the trial.

Mr. President, in the case of the Senator from Kansas he is charged with having violated a statute. I do not know how many lawyers in this body have considered the question whether or not the crime charged against him is within the statute. I have not studied that question, and I am unable to commit myself, except to say that my first impressions, which are not always sufficient to carry a lawyer to a final conclusion, are with the four dissenting judges and of the Supreme Court who declared that the case was not within the statute. Five judges asserted that it was within the statute. If his case was within the statute, then another case that came here to grieve us is within the statute. Is not that, after all, the question the Senate will have to decide first—is it within the statute or is it not?

Mr. President, the Senator from Texas has alluded to the fact that a member of this body has died, charged with an offense under this statute and convicted of the offense, and the Senate has not taken the usual notice of the fact of his death, and that his successor will be the first legal information we have that he is dead. Mr. President, we all know that he is dead. I never should have mentioned this case in the Senate but for the fact that the Senator has referred to it. We all know he is dead. I wish to say for myself here, knowing something of the facts, whether the law is as the five judges or as the four judges held, I could not bring myself to believe, and would not if called upon here to act believe, that the dead Senator was guilty of any crime which would justify his expulsion from the Senate. Against the sworn testimony of confessed perjurers and forgers and bribers and thieves I will put, when it comes to make up my judgment, his long years of honest service in this body. I will put against it his devotion to the interests of his people and the interests of the people at large. I will put against it the fact that this man, with unnumbered opportunities to create for himself wealth, went down to the grave practically a pauper. It will need more than the testimony of any self-convicted thief and forger to convince me that the dead Senator from Oregon was a vicious criminal at the time of his death or at any time in his history in this service.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has said, this is an extremely painful subject. But it has been brought before the Senate, it is here, and I think it would be most unfortunate if from what has been said any impression should go out to the public which is in the least misleading as to exactly what the Senate has done or left undone.

First, in regard to the death of the Senator to which reference has been made, no notice of a Senator's death is required by law or under the rules, so far as I am aware, and I should suppose that the death of a Senator is a matter of which the Chair and the clerks take judicial notice. That is certainly done whenever a Senator dies during a recess. His name is omitted when the first roll of the Senate is called at the opening of the session. The name of Senator Platt of Connecticut, who died during the last recess of the Senate, was omitted when the roll of the Senate was first called at the beginning of this session. My former colleague's name was not called the year before, and both instances show that judicial notice had been taken of the fact of their deaths, although formal announcement was made subsequently. Formal announcement is merely a usual form, nothing more. It was omitted in this instance—very properly, in my opinion, for I think the death of the Senator from Oregon was a case where silence was best and kindest.

Mr. President, I agree with the general purport of what has been said by the Senator from Texas. I think there has been here, naturally and in all kindness no doubt, too much of a tendency to remember Senators and forget the Senate. I think we may be quite right in following what I believe to be the English practice, as the Senator from Colorado has pointed out, of taking no action here while the trial of the charges against a Senator is still pending in the courts. But I do not see——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me a question right here?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Suppose that a Senator was within two years of the expiration of his term; that he was convicted; that the courts reversed the conviction for error; that the case was sent back for new trial; that it was tried again, and that his term expired before the final judgment in the court of last resort, and the sentence below should be affirmed. The Senate would be in the attitude of having allowed an unworthy Senator to pass from its jurisdiction without recording one syllable of criticism against him.

Mr. LODGE. I quite agree with the Senator that under the precedents, and I think they are the precedents, such a case as he mentions might arise, and it would certainly be excessively unfortunate. But the Senate has been unwilling, and I think quite naturally unwilling, to anticipate the action of the courts. But I do not think, Mr. President, that awaiting the decision of the courts affects the action of the committee in leaving the Senator's name off all committees of the Senate when the list was made up, especially when the Senator has himself made the request that they should do so. I think that fact separates it from the other question of awaiting or not awaiting final action in the courts.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I am trying now to prevent the Senate from establishing the precedent. I am utterly opposed to the practice prevailing in the English Parliament of allowing the courts to dispose of the matter before the legislative body takes it up.

I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, who intimates that the Senate is following the precedents, if it is true that any Senator was ever indicted, until within the last few years?

Mr. LODGE. Never to my knowledge.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Nebraska, Mr. Dietrich, was indicted, and he came in and asked for the appointment of a committee. That committee was raised to investigate the matter and report. The Senate, so far as I know, took no formal action upon the report.

In the earlier days it is possible that an indictment was returned against Senator Blount, from Tennessee. There an attempt was made to impeach him, and it was held that he was not an impeachable officer. It is probably true—I have not looked up the history of that case for many years—that he was indicted, but at any rate he withdrew from the Senate either by resignation or by expulsion. I think——

Mr. LODGE. I do not recall that he was indicted, but he may have been.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not sure. At any rate, he relieved the Senate of his presence, and in that case it was a political offense more than a personal one. He was charged, as I remember, with inciting insurrection among the Indians, or giving to them advice hostile to the Government.

Mr. LODGE. I think it was treason.

Mr. BAILEY. That would have been the technical charge undoubtedly. It was charged that he incited Indians to resist the authority of the Government.

I am free to say—and I beg the Senator's pardon for interposing at this point—that I am anxious to see the Senate establish its own way of dealing with these questions as they arise, without waiting the tedious processes of the courts.

The Senator will indulge me long enough to say that if the Senator from Colorado, for whom I have the most profound respect and whose statement with reference to the Senator from Oregon weighs with me, is right as to the innocence of the dead Senator, and my policy could have been pursued of investigating the charge as soon as it was brought to the formal notice of the Senate, the Senate would have found that the Oregon Senator was persecuted—assuming that the Senator from Colorado is correct—and we would have heard the announcement of his death and we would have adjourned out of respect to his memory. I only instance that to show the embarrassment which results from leaving these matters until they are finally adjudicated by the courts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I did not mean to be understood as saying that I thought the English precedent was always wise by any means. All I said was that I thought it very natural that, never having had such a case in the Senate until recently, the Senate should follow the English precedents. But, Mr. President, I entirely agree with the Senator from Texas that we ought to have it distinctly understood that action by the Senate is not to be foreclosed by any judicial action. Under no circumstances can the Senate escape responsibility in that way, nor ought it to do so if it could. It is quite conceivable that a man might be found guilty by a jury whom, after investigation, we should hold innocent. On the other hand, I for one wish to say emphatically that I do not think acquittal on a technicality as to jurisdiction or as to the offense not coming within the statute is sufficient ground for inaction here or one to which the Senate should be confined. Whenever the Senate does act it must act on broader grounds and higher principles than these narrow, legal, and technical ones afford, if we are to keep the reputation of the Senate what it always has been and what we wish it always to be.

For my own part I should have been very glad to have seen the Senate in each of these cases, when they had reached the point of a conviction by a jury, make investigation in a proper way through one of their own committees, and I do not when I say that in the least underrate the difficulties which hedge such action.

Mr. President, I do not see how the Senate could, with propriety, have behaved otherwise than it did in regard to the Senator from Oregon. I do not see how the committee could have behaved with propriety otherwise than they have done in making up the committees. It seems to me they proceeded with good taste and with proper judgment. Whether we should go further, whether we should take any steps now toward an investigation of the remaining case, is for the Senate to determine.

But, Mr. President, I think it very important that it should be understood by the people of the United States that the Senate has considered these cases with a full appreciation of their profound gravity and of the meaning which they have in regard to the position of this great body in the eyes of the people of the United States. Men come and go, but the integrity of the Senate and of the House and a belief in that integrity are essential not merely to our own good name, but to the honor of the Government and the welfare of the American people.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, as a member of the committee to arrange the committees, I wish to speak for a moment only. It is a very happy thing that there have been in the history of the Republic, I think, but three cases of the kind to which reference has been made. It is to be hoped that in as many years of the future there will be less than have occurred within the last two or three years.

The embarrassment and mortification arising through the indictment of Senators for violating the law of the land, are of course confined to no Senator nor to one side of the Senate. It is a feeling which is shared by all of us. The subject, to my knowledge, has had much consideration on the other side of the Chamber and on this side, as to the proper course which in dignity and justice the Senate should pursue in such cases.

I agree with the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] that the action of the committee and the Senate, if the report shall be adopted, in omitting the Senator from Kansas from all committees is anomalous, for he is a member of the Senate. His name is on the roll—as legally there as that of any other Senator. He is entitled to vote; he is entitled to act upon committees, for a State which is entitled to send a Senator into this body, as all the States are—and it can not be deprived of that right by the Senate or by any law—is entitled to have the Senator it sends here participate in the important legislative duties involved in committee action. But this is all changed by the request of the Senator not to be included in committee assignments.

So when it was suggested to this committee that the Senator from Kansas should, under the circumstances, be omitted from the list of committees, we were confronted at once by the suggestion which has been made by the Senator from Texas, and we were only relieved from the embarrassment by the request of the Senator from Kansas. The Senator from Kansas has acted with great propriety in absenting himself from the Senate under the circumstances. It has been, I am bound to assume and believe, out of a proper sense of delicacy and deference to his colleagues. No Senator is ever displaced from a committee, when once placed there by the Senate, without his consent, except, so far as I remember, Mr. Sumner; and we were relieved and gratified that the Senator from Kansas should have supplemented his absence from the Senate Chamber, pending the determination in the courts of his case, by a request that he be not assigned, until that determination, to any positions on committees.

Now, if the State of Kansas is deprived for the time of a Senator it is not by the Senate. She is deprived of a part of her representation here for a time by the position in which one of the Senators finds himself. That is embarrassing. There is only one man I know who can relieve the Senate in such a case of its embarrassment, unless we abandon the English rule on the subject, and that is the Senator who is involved. A Senator might leave his place in the Senate, if he were so minded, fight out the battle in the courts, establish his innocence, if possible, and then go to his State and ask to be returned in vindication to this body. That is a remedy we can not control.

The Senator from Texas referred to the case of Senator Dietrich, of Nebraska. Senator Dietrich asked for no investigation by the Senate while his case was sub judice. After the circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska had dismissed the indictment and discharged Senator Dietrich, holding the indictment to be bad, he came into the Senate, made a statement, and presented a resolution for the appointment of a select committee to investigate his case. And out of the action of the Senate and out of the investigation by that committee comes something of an argument entitled to be considered as to the course which in such cases should be established by the Senate.

That committee was made up of Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, and Senator Platt, of Connecticut, both gone forever from our midst and both unspeakably mourned, and I had the honor to be associated with them as a Republican member of the committee. From the minority were the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS], and Mr. Cockrell, from Missouri. We sent for all the information which was possessed by the Department of Justice and the district attorney for Nebraska, and a list of the names of witnesses who had been before the grand jury and who had been subpœnaed evidence on the trial. The committee examined searchingly all of the witnesses, and came unanimously to the conclusion, Mr. President, that the charge against Senator Dietrich was utterly without foundation, and so reported to the Senate.

Now, I doubt whether the Senator from Texas, for whom I have great admiration and respect, both for his ability as a lawyer and his sense of justice, would be willing on careful reflection to establish the precedent that the moment a Senator is indicted for a violation of the law the Senate should institute an investigation into the same charge, pursue it to the end, and acquit him or convict him, executing if the latter a judgment of expulsion. It rather shocks one's sense of fairness to contemplate two prosecutions at the same time against a man for the same offense in different tribunals.

Mr. President, whatever the Senate might do, whatever its determination might be, the jurisdiction of the court would remain unaffected. The officers of another branch of the Government would not deem themselves obstructed in the regular prosecution of that indictment. This indicted Senator, with his case prepared to be presented in the usual way in a court of justice, would be summoned to his defense before a committee of the Senate and called upon to give to the committee and to his prosecutors in the court all the evidence gathered for his defense. That, Mr. President, would be unjust. It would handicap him in his defense unless there were some way to bring about an acquiescence by the other department of the Government, the judicial, in the action or judgment of the Senate.

Then, too, in prosecuting this investigation the Senate would be entitled, and ought to be entitled, to the evidence possessed by the Government against the Senator. We could not very well ask the Department of Justice to send here the whole case. And the whole case ought to be before the Senate just as it should be before a court—before judgment, either of acquittal or condemnation. We could not very well summon the Department of Justice and the district attorney of the district to bring before a Senate committee all the evidence gathered by the Government and upon which it relied for conviction. That would embarrass the judicial and executive department of the Government in the discharge of public duty.

And, Mr. President, there is another and worse feature about such a course. Men sometimes are indicted not so much upon the truth as by way of conspiracy or in obedience to public clamor. In a criminal case, pending trial before a common-law jury in the tribunal created by the Constitution for the determination of such cases, an expulsion from the Senate and judgment arrived at upon a partial knowledge of the case would go with crushing and inexpressible weight against a possibly innocent man.

In support of the English rule, what the Senator from Texas says is absolutely true, that this body in determining who shall leave it and who may remain in it is above the courts and it is above the Congress. It is a part of the penalty denounced by the statute in cases like the one pending in Missouri that upon conviction the defendant shall be disqualified forever from holding any office of trust, honor, or profit under the United States. Of course, as to a Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives, that part of the penalty denounced by the statute is absolutely void and ineffective.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator will remember that the man proceeded against might be disqualified from holding any other office under the Government, although the law could not disqualify him for the House or the Senate. I take it the statute makers——

Mr. SPOONER. Of course; I had not finished. This provision of the statute can not by any human possibility operate to vacate a Senator's seat or the seat of a Member of the House, because the Constitution has made each body the sole judge of the election, qualifications, and return of its Members. It requires two-thirds to expel a Member and two-thirds to expel a Senator, and a majority only to enact this law. It is impossible that it could apply or could operate to vacate the seat of a Senator.

So, Mr. President, if the court acquitted a Senator the Senate would be entirely at liberty, and if the circumstances seemed to justify it would be shamefully derelict if it failed to investigate the Senator acquitted by a jury and to try the case for itself, and if convinced that the man was unworthy of a seat in the body to pronounce and execute that judgment against him. That affords the remedy without at the same time prejudicing either the Government or the defendant by an abandonment of the English rule.

Of course every member of this body wishes there were no such questions possible to be suggested. Now, as to the failure of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON]—for it was his duty under the custom—to announce the death of the late Senator from Oregon. He consulted his colleagues about it. It is just to him to say that in this public way since the question has been raised.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly. I shall be through in a second.

Mr. PATTERSON. I wish to ask a question simply for information.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir.

Mr. PATTERSON. Suppose the Senator should be finally convicted under such a statute as the two Senators were indicted for violating, and the governor of the State should conclude that, the Senator being disqualified for holding any office of trust or profit, and so forth, under the United States, a vacancy existed, and appoint a Senator to fill the vacancy, would he not under the circumstances have authority to so act?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think the Senate of the United States would feel itself in the slightest degree bound by the opinion, and the erroneous opinion, too, of the governor of a State.

Mr. PATTERSON. If the statutes of the United States and the Constitution declare a person upon conviction to be disqualified from holding an office of trust or profit, is there not a vacancy upon conviction, to be filled by the governor of the State?

Mr. SPOONER. Of course, in most cases that may be true, the statute being a self-executing statute or the constitutional provision being a self-executing provision; but the cases I have put are clear exceptions, for the reason that the Constitution has given the sole jurisdiction to vacate a seat in this body to the Senate and in the other House to the House of Representatives.

I was speaking of the action of the Senator from Oregon in not announcing formally, as is the custom, the death of his colleague. It was his wish to do it.

Mr. SCOTT. He ought to have done it.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from West Virginia says he ought to have done it. Some of us think, in the situation, he was not only excusable for omitting to do it, but that if he had done it he would simply and unnecessarily have been intensifying the tragedy and bringing fresh sorrow to the hearts of those who loved John H. Mitchell, because, Mr. President, no man in this body needs to be told that unless an announcement of that kind is followed by the unanimous adoption of the customary resolution of adjournment out of respect to the memory of the dead, it is a reproach, not a tribute. It is not to be contemplated that it should be done or attempted where there is knowledge that it will be controverted, and the Senator from Oregon knew, for to my knowledge he had been so informed, that there would be objection to the resolution and adverse votes upon it. Whether just or unjust is not the question; it is the fact to which I refer, and it was for that reason, and that only, to prevent an inference from nonaction by this body or controverted action in it that would put an additional stain here upon the memory of a Senator while he lay unburied in his home in that distant State that the notice was omitted.

I have thought the Senator from Oregon acted wisely, although we were all pained that there was an environment which seemed to demand such action. The world sometimes will not stop to hear a motion for a new trial in any man's case, but sooner or later the time comes, Mr. President, as a rule, when the people do justice.

Mr. President, I have taken more time than I intended.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I was very unfortunate in what I said, or in my manner of saying it, if I conveyed the impression that I intended to criticise the remaining Senator from Oregon for his failure to announce the death of the late Senator from that State.

Mr. SPOONER. Allow me to say to the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. If that inference might be drawn from my remarks I disclaim any such purpose. I did not impute, or intend to impute, that to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. For I want to say that I cheerfully bear my small part of the responsibility for his failure to make the announcement. Indeed, I went so far as to tell him that I would be compelled by a sense of duty to vote against a motion to adjourn in honor of the memory of any Senator who stood under a conviction in the courts. That was not an agreeable thing to say, but I cheerfully take my part of the responsibility for that failure.

Mr. President, although I rose only to make that statement, being on my feet I will crave the indulgence of the Senate while I make a brief reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin that it is not compatible with the spirit of American institutions to have two prosecutions in progress against the same individual for the same offense at the same time. If you deem this a prosecution, that is true; but the Senator, who seldom overlooks anything, happens to have overlooked in this case that the Constitution itself provides for that very procedure. The apparent contradiction is not a real contradiction, because the object of the two proceedings is different. The power of expulsion, like the power of impeachment, is exercised for the purpose of removing an unworthy official, and thus freeing the public service from the harm and scandal of his incumbency, while the criminal prosecution is intended to punish him for his crimes. In other words, the right to impeach a civil officer and to remove him by expulsion from the place which he has shown himself unfit to occupy does not abridge the right of the people to call him to the bar of public justice and compel him to answer for his crime. Yet, of course, it is contrary to the genius of the American institutions to prosecute a man twice for the same offense. But the law, the Constitution, and the theory all recognize a difference between an impeachment or a motion to expel and a prosecution for the ordinary crimes which a Senator might have committed.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, did the Senator ever hear of criminal prosecution and an impeachment proceeding together?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, there have been very few impeachments in this country, and I believe never one where a man was guilty of a statutory crime. The only conviction that ever happened was in the case of Judge Foster, and I believe everyone now concedes that the Senate convicted a crazy man in that proceeding. Under our system of life tenure that seemed to be the only way to relieve the people of that judicial district from the work of an unbalanced mind; and so they convicted him. Without asserting it absolutely, I do not now recall that any civil officer called here to answer in an impeachment proceeding has been guilty of a statutory crime, except in the case of Belknap, who was so guilty that he resigned before he could be arraigned before the bar of this body, and I believe a reference to the votes upon the question of his conviction or acquittal will reveal the fact that he only escaped conviction upon the ground that a majority of the Senators felt that he had evaded the jurisdiction of the Senate by resigning his office.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. My friend from Texas of course did not understand me as denying the power, but the wisdom and justice; that is all.

Mr. BAILEY. I perfectly understood that; but I was reminding the Senator from Wisconsin that the Constitution requires us to disinguish between a proceeding to relieve the Government of an unworthy officer and a proceeding to convict the same unworthy officer of his crime.

I never can agree, myself, that the Senate shall wait upon the slow processes of the courts, because as a lawyer, Mr. President, with great pride in my profession, I would incomparably rather hear people complain that the court was too technical than to hear them applaud the court because it was not technical enough; for I have always found that when they complain against the court for being technical their complaint is really against the law, and when they applaud the court for brushing aside the technicalities I have always found that they were applauding the court because it had set aside the law.

I am one of those who do not want to see the safeguards of the citizen broken down. I am one of those who hope never to see the courts of the country proceed with indecent haste. But, sir, it will not do for the Senate to wait until indictments have been found, and motions to quash have been made and granted; then new indictments found, with a trial and conviction, followed by a motion for a new trial, sometimes granted and sometimes overruled, and when overruled an appeal to the highest court of the land, and that court constrained by its sense of justice and its knowledge of the law to send the case back for another trial, where again it must repeat this series of motions and delays. I do not complain at the court for granting motions that ought to be granted, for allowing delays that ought to be allowed under the law and according to the rules of justice. I complain that the Senate must sit here and await the slow and tedious process of the court and await a judgment that it can not accept as final in the end.

I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that it is beyond the power of the Congress to prescribe who is qualified and who is disqualified to sit in this Chamber. The Constitution fixes that, and under the Constitution the Senate is the judge of it. All that the law meant, I assume all that the lawmakers intended it to mean, is that if a Senator or Representative should be convicted under that statute he is disqualified forever after, not to sit in this body or in the House at the other end of this Capitol—because Congress had no power to determine that—but he is disqualified from holding any other office of profit or trust. If the judgment of a court were brought to the bar of this Senate and tendered as a reason why we should unseat one Senator and seat another I would never recognize the validity of that statute to such an extent. If a Senator or a Member, having been convicted of a violation of that statute, sought an appointment under the Government to some other place, then I should say the statute would operate as a bar against him. I admit the right of no court to determine who may or who may not sit in this Chamber.

Indeed, Mr. President, I can easily conceive a case where a Senator might be acquitted on a criminal charge and yet be expelled from the Senate. Suppose he pleads the statute of limitations? I would unhesitatingly vote to expel a Senator who stood in court and protected himself against an indictment by saying: "I committed that crime four years ago, and therefore this prosecution is barred by the statute of limitations."

I can also conceive of a case where a Senator might be convicted in a court, and I would be so well satisfied of his innocence that I would leave his vacant seat as a protest against the malice of his accusers. I can imagine a time of great popular prejudice, when the public mind might be stirred to its profoundest depths, and when party spirit might run so high that they would persecute an innocent man who had the courage to defy a popular clamor. In a time of great and general excitement an upright Senator's enemies might indict and convict him of a crime. Such a Senator, convicted under such circumstances, might be an honor to the Senate, and I would esteem it a privilege to occupy a seat beside his vacant chair.

Mr. President and Senators, I am not supersensitive, and perhaps I am sometimes more indifferent to the criticisms with which this Senate is assailed than a Senator ought to be; but none of us can be unmindful that throughout the length and breadth of this land, in pulpit and press, we are daily being called upon to answer at the bar of public opinion why we do not call Senators to answer at the bar of the Senate. Within two years flippant and thoughtless men have done more to diminish the respect in which the Senate has been held by the public for more than a century than in any other twenty years of the Senate's existence. You know and I know that upon the average to-day the Senate is as clean as it ever was. You know and I know that the very statute which forbids Senators and Representatives to appear as attorneys before these Departments had its origin in the fact that during the days of the civil war the practice became so frequent as to become a public scandal, and Congress was compelled by its self-respect and in obedience to a wholesome public sentiment to make the law. Yet not long ago I heard of an eminent minister denouncing the Senate of to-day as more corrupt than ever before in its history, and lamenting that the good old times—the times in which giants lived—could not come back again. He cited the Congress during the war times, forgetful of the fact that the greed of Senators then needed the restraining prohibition of the law, while that can not be said of many Senators to-day.

We have our differences, and sometimes they are acrimonious. I have no doubt that on that side of the Chamber you sometimes think that on this side we are demagogues; and I know that on this side we sometimes believe that you are the mere creatures of corporate greed [laughter]; but at the bottom of his heart there is not one Senator in this Chamber to-day who believes that there are four members of this body who are actuated by other than high and lofty motives. Yet, sir, we have fallen to the point that even when in the common playhouses of the country where cheap playwriters stage cheap plays, the audience applauds when Senators are described as grafters.

I believe the rule—the best and safest rule—is that when a Senator finds himself compelled, by a sense of delicacy toward his associates, to absent himself from the Senate, he ought to resign and give his people a chance to fill his place while the case against him proceeds, and, unless he represents a constituency unlike any that I have ever known, if he can vindicate himself against the charge they will call him back into their honorable service with renewed devotion to him. But if a Senator so situated will not resign, the Senate ought either to relieve him from the sense of delicacy which keeps him from the Chamber or else it ought to relieve his State from the representation of a man that it will not allow to exercise the rights and privileges of his great office.

There have been within the last ten years five indictments of Senators, and each of those indictments implied a crime committed for the sake of money. It is time that the Senate was testifying to the world that this is no place for a man who wants to make money illegally or unfairly, not to say dishonestly.

If a man in an unfortunate personal encounter should be compelled to take the life of his fellow-man, that might or might not unfit him to be a Senator. It would depend entirely upon the provocation. It sometimes happens that high-minded men are compelled, by a sense of self-respect, to slay; but it never happens that a high-minded man attempts to line his pockets with dishonest gain.

The only question in my mind for the Senate to decide is whether the Senator attempted to traffic in his great office. If he did, there is no justification for him; if he did not, we ought to certify to the world that he has been accused without sufficient reason.

I protest against leaving the Senate to suffer under the ribald jests of many good men while the court slowly proceeds with an inquiry which we ought to conduct and conclude without delay.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, has the resolution been agreed to?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution has not yet been agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I hope the question will be put upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not wish to interfere with the desire of the Senator, but I should like to say a few words.

Mr. HALE. I was merely calling the attention of the Senate to the resolution.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator if he desires to address the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Not at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] is recognized.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, this is a painful subject. I shall endeavor to say nothing that will make it more painful, and what I shall say will be brief.

It does not seem to me, Mr. President, that the Senate has erred in any respect with regard to this matter. I shall not discuss the case which is now pending in a court, and for the reason that I think public discussion of matters which are in the course of adjudication should be avoided. For the same reason I do not think that it was incumbent upon the Senate to have a Senatorial investigation running along parallel to a judicial investigation, predicated upon identically the same transaction, although they differentiated in their juridical and their Senatorial aspects.

I have heard the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] make many speeches; seldom have I had the satisfaction of concurring in all he said in those speeches; but I do concur in all that he has said to-day and consider that he has drawn the various lines of refinement with great skill, great care, and with great equity and precision of judgment.

The reasons, Mr. President, that it would have been inappropriate for the Senate of the United States to enter upon an investigation here of a subject-matter which was under advisement in the criminal courts, it seems to me, are manifold. Largely, if not principally, is the reason that no man can attend two trials at once; no man can be in two places at the same time; no body of witnesses can be in attendance or looking to present themselves to two distinct tribunals under one condition of circumstances; no man can have a perfectly fair trial when he is at one and the same time with one power pulling him this way, another power pulling him that way, and having it upon his mind to concentrate his forces, whatever they may be, upon both of them. This is a difficulty that lies in the nature of things and can not be avoided.

There is another reason. The judicial examination is attended with more precise process, is regulated by more precise machinery, and is that examination which, as a rule—I will not say every time—is more apt to be conducted and brought to a conclusion with calmness of mind and without prejudice. Political bodies, however high they may be, however intelligent they my be, and however right-minded they may be, are seldom quite so serene and so unaccompanied by the disturbing concomitants of life as to render them quite so reliable in their juridical opinions and in connate matters as are the courts. They in their structure and nature and inculcation and being are more calm and more independent.

There is still another reason, Mr. President, why, in my judgment, it would not have been a wise thing to have conducted here, cotemporaneously with and collaterally to a judicial investigation, also a Senatorial investigation; and this applies to this case especially. As I understand the matter, though I do not claim to be entirely or familiarly conversant with it—I presume that nobody is, for we have only had scrappy information about it, a little here and a little there, from divergent points of the press—but the first intimation, if I recollect aright, about this matter was either cotemporaneously with or soon after the courts took jurisdiction of it. It was not practicable for the Senate to have taken jurisdiction of this transaction before they found that the courts had it in jurisdiction and consideration. The Senate could not have proceeded without traversing the same lines in large degree that the court was to traverse; and no matter what the Senate might think about it, whether in the direction of the guilt or of the innocence of the accused, its action would have been the passage of opinion by an influential body of men upon a question which was hanging in the judicial scale.

Ours is a country which, it has been said by the most learned and able commentators, is more controlled by public opinion than any other. When that opinion has been duly and maturely formed upon a condition of things which has been fully stated, there is no public opinion in the world that I had rather look to for a correct judgment than to that of the sober-minded American people. But, Mr. President, public opinion upon the identical or connate subject ought never to be invoked while the scales of justice are trembling in the balance. The best conduct of any good citizen while a trial is pending that concerns the rights of man in tender degree is to stand in awe of justice and let justice speak. Had the Senate undertaken to investigate this subject-matter while the courts were in proceeding about it, it would seem to me that it had acted inadvisable and rather in consonance with clamor than at the dictates of evenhanded and level-headed justice.

It is true that we are subjected to inconvenience. One Senator says that the Senate is subjected to ribald jests. Mr. President, if he can invent any process or suggest any receipt that will prevent a Senator from being subjected to ribald jests, he would be held as the greatest discoverer and inventor of all the ages, and I should like to honor and gratify myself by being the first subscriber to the propagation of his work. [Laughter.] It can not be done; it never has been done. No man can go before the public without having people opposed to him, at least not by any process that I have ever known. No procession can forbid a boy to get upon a wall and make fingers and faces at somebody in it as it passes.

But after all, Mr. President, the people have their own way of estimating these things. I do not think that many honest and brave reputations in this country have ever been destroyed by a ribald jest. They are dreadfully annoying; they are dreadfully irritating; but not to notice them at all is the best way in the world to treat them. If you notice one and hit at it like you would at a mosquito or hornet, a whole swarm of mosquitoes or hornets will gather on the other side while you are trying to get rid of one. It is just one of the incidents of life in which the philosophy of the stoic is the best of all applications.

I am not going to discuss this case at all. If it be a case of guilt, let no man apprehend that either the Senate of the United States is going to be ruined or that the country is going to pieces, or that it will escape the just judgment of mankind. Where there is guilt in such high places, people find it out, and punishment in one shape or another is sure to be administered. Suppose it is a case of innocence. The law, Mr. President, enjoins upon each of us—and it is the most saving of all the principles of that merciful justice upon which our whole structure of jurisprudence is based—to presume no man guilty until he is proved to be guilty.

I will relate, Mr. President, a little incident that I heard but a few days ago. It was in relation to Gen. Robert E. Lee, when he was president of Washington and Lee College. Sitting at the head of the board where the faculty gathered, and where inquiries were being made about the progress and the conduct of the young men of the college, a professor remarked to him, "I hear that Mr. Blank is drinking too much." "Professor," said the president of Washington and Lee College, "do not tell me what you hear about any young man; tell me what you know and can prove. Every one of these young men here is entitled to the benefit of the common-law presumption of innocence until he is proved to be guilty."

Mr. President, it does not do for the Senate of the United States, whatever may be its sidelong information, to turn from its path of dignity and duty because of cartoons in a newspaper or because of ribald jests. It must attend upon the due and orderly procedure of slow-footed but in almost all cases certain justice. If it be put to inconvenience, let it suffer it. We can not avoid inconveniences in this life; we can not get through a day or an hour without them. If a State suffers, we can not help that. If we suffer, we can not help that. The only way that we can endeavor to do is to try to deserve not to suffer and wait the patient judgment of enlightened and honorable mankind upon our conduct.

A few people will say that because this man or that man has made a malodorous reputation the Senate is bad. Mr. President, there was never a body of men upon the face of the earth half as big or a fourth as big, or almost any fractional part of a body as large and varied as is the United States Senate, that did not, now and then, disclose some ill character that ought never to have been a part of it. But those bodies have never been misjudged, except in some transient fever of aberrated opinion of those circumstances. We do not cease to reverence the disciples because there was a Judas that broke bread with them; we do not cease to admire George Washington because he had generals in his camp who turned against him; and there is no danger that the American people will ever suppose that their Senate is a discredited body because they have heard or may ascertain that now and then some State has had the misfortune to send here some man who was not the peer of his fellows.

I hope this subject may be dropped for the present. It may come again in due course. There are courts in America yet, and we have no right to distrust that they will attend duly to their criminal jurisdiction.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

The resolution was agreed to.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to inquire whether it is the purpose of the Senator from New Hampshire to have the Senate take up the bill for consideration at this time?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say in reply to the inquiry that it is not my purpose. I thought that if it was made the unfinished business Senators would have an opportunity to consider it during the recess, and immediately after the recess I would submit some observations in support of the bill, and other Senators, of course, could then proceed to discuss it. That is my purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the motion is not open to debate.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not debatable. I understand that.

Mr. ALLISON. I was aware of that, but I desired a little information before I was able to cast my vote for the proposition of the Senator. But, as I now understand him, it is the purpose of the Senator to call up the measure and make some few observations.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not to-day.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the holidays?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not before the holidays.

Mr. SPOONER. Some other day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Some other day.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to ask unanimous consent to say a word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it is too early for the Senate now to decide what particular important measure shall have precedence after the holidays.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask for a vote on my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. SCOTT. Let the motion be restated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

WOMEN IN THE CANAL ZONE.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, on Saturday last a statement was made, on the authority of the New York Herald, by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], in regard to the importation of women from Martinique to the Isthmus of Panama. On the authority of the Secretary of War, I took occasion at the time to deny the truth of the statement put forth in the newspaper; and I now ask permission, without detaining the Senate to read them, to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a letter from the Secretary of War and the accompanying correspondence relating to the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and the communication and accompanying papers will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter and accompanying papers are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 16, 1905.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to the subject of your telephone message of yesterday, in which you said that it had been stated on the floor of the Senate, on the authority of a newspaper, "that a cargo of women had been brought to Colon, under the authority of the Commission, to be distributed up and down among the laborers on the Isthmus for immoral purposes," I beg to say that my answer to you that the statement was false was founded on information received in letters written me by Judge Magoon. Subsequently I had the correspondence of Judge Magoon with the Commission examined, and all the papers found relevant to the matter have been sent to you. The records of the Commission have this morning been searched and the vouchers accompanying the accounts of labor agents examined by Mr. Pepperman, the assistant chief of the Washington office of the Canal Commission. These records show that the labor agents of the Commission had no authority conferred on them except to pay for the transportation of laborers, and the vouchers show no payments except for the transportation of laborers. I have also conferred with Mr. Shonts and with Colonel Ernst, of the Commission. I find also that Mr. Jackson Smith, the chief of the bureau of labor and quarters on the Isthmus, in charge of the importation of laborers, who happened to be in Washington at the time, was interrogated in respect to the matter when the first dispatch from Judge Magoon came. The correspondence that I have sent you speaks for itself. After this investigation, I am able to reiterate my statement to you over the telephone, "that the charge that a cargo of women was brought to Colon on a vessel of the Commission, or under their authority, or with their encouragement, to be distributed up and down among the laborers of the Isthmus for immoral purposes," is unqualifiedly false.

I may say generally that the Commission has been exceedingly solicitous concerning the conditions as to morality and decent living of those whom they are gathering into settlements along the line of the canal on the Isthmus. They are furnishing schools, and they have now in their pay six or seven pastors of the different churches to which the laborers belong, including the Roman Catholic Church, the Methodist Church, the Baptist Church, the Protestant Episcopal Church, the Presbyterian Church, and the Salvation Army. Eight buildings have already been assigned for religious purposes, and as soon as the buildings now under construction for school purposes are completed they are to be devoted to religious purposes on Sunday. I venture to say that there are no more law-abiding and orderly communities assembled under analogous circumstances anywhere than in the villages and towns situate along the line of the canal and the railway upon the Isthmus.

Very sincerely, yours,

WM. H. TAFT.

HON. H. C. LODGE,
United States Senate.

NOVEMBER 16, 1905—7.40 p. m.

ISTHMIAN, Washington.

SHONTS: Rumored here that many of the 150 women recently arrived on ship from Martinique and represented as employees' wives, are not married, and have been brought here and distributed among men by our officials for immoral purposes. First knowledge of their arrival and this rumor reached me November 14; immediately brought to Stevens's attention in writing, and instructed chief of the Zone police to make quiet investigation and ascertain the facts. Also requested the municipalities, where such ordinances do not exist, to enact ordinance prohibiting lewdness. Confer with Jackson Smith, chief of branch of labor and quarters, engineering department, sole charge of the work of bringing in and disposing of common laborers. He is in Washington, D. C.; ascertain the facts from him and confer with Secretary of War.

This matter involves Zone government, as that government is charged with protecting public morals. Heard this morning that sensational article was mailed New York Herald to-day.

MAGOON.

ISTHMIAN CANAL ZONE, EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Ancon, November 16, 1905.

SIR: I have the honor to bring to your attention copy of a letter dated November 14, addressed to Chief Engineer Stevens; copy of order issued November 16 to the chief of the Zone police, and copy of cablegram this day sent to Chairman Shonts, with reference to the rumor that 150 Martinique women have been brought to the Zone and distributed among our employees for immoral purposes.

It is no doubt true that private contractors find it advisable, if not necessary, to supply their common laborers with women, and quite possible, if the practice is not permitted in the Zone, that it may affect the question of labor supply from the West Indies or elsewhere.

In this situation I would like to be advised what, if any, action I am to take should it be established that the rumors referred to have some basis of fact.

Very respectfully, CHARLES E. MAGOON, Governor.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.

ANCON, November 14, 1905.

SIR: A rumor comes to me that 150 women from the island of Martinique have been brought to the Zone by the division of labor and quarters of the department of construction and engineering and permitted to disperse among the laborers engaged in canal construction work and are now living with the men as concubines. I sincerely hope and believe that the rumor is not true. Although not advised of their coming, I heard that there had arrived on the Isthmus about 150 women who were the wives and families of laborers who were brought from Martinique. This was gratifying intelligence, as it seemed to show that the men were satisfied with conditions here. There is no reasonable objection to women coming here for employment as servants, laundresses, boarding-house keepers, etc., but that is very different from bringing in women for immoral purposes.

I have heard that railroad companies and other private concerns in the United States and elsewhere, employing large bodies of common laborers brought from foreign countries, sometimes resort to the practice of importing women from the same countries for the use of the men. Such a practice indulged in by the Government of the United States, or any of its agencies, would shock the public mind and be so repugnant to our citizens that it would seriously embarrass not only the agency, but also the administration responsible for the acts of that agency.

If there is any ground for believing that the women referred to, or any part of them, were brought to the Zone, or came voluntarily, for the purpose suggested, they should be gathered up and returned to Martinique, without regard to the effect upon the several hundred workmen from the island now employed on the construction work.

As already stated, I hope there is no basis of truth for this scandalous rumor, and shall be glad to learn the facts, if you know them, or to be assured that neither the Commission nor the Panama Railroad Company is involved in the matter.

Yours, very truly, CHARLES E. MAGOON, Governor.

Mr. JOHN F. STEVENS,
Chief Engineer, Ancon.

ANCON, November 16, 1905.

SIR: It has come to my knowledge that a rumor is in circulation that within the past few days about 150 women from the island of Martinique arrived in Colon, a port of the Republic of Panama, and from there dispersed to several localities within the Zone where workmen from Martinique are stationed, and also that in numerous instances women who came in said party are living and cohabiting with men who are not their husbands.

I am confident that a majority of these women were married and came to the Isthmus for the purpose of living with their husbands. I know it is generally believed that in many of the West Indies a great many men and women live together without being married, and it would be difficult to prevent such immoral conduct along the line of the canal, for it will be difficult to secure admissions of wrongful and illegal action, especially among people who do not consider such conduct as being reprehensible, and it will of course be impossible for us to prove that a man and woman living together and claiming to be husband and wife are not husband and wife. It is, however, incumbent upon us to ascertain the facts in this matter, and I wish you would make a systematic investigation with reference to the women referred to above. The investigation should be conducted quietly in order not to induce scandal or unnecessarily offend innocent parties, yet must be sufficiently thorough to develop the truth.

You will make such investigation and report the facts to me in writing as early as the exigencies of the public service and the limited means at your command permit.

Yours, very truly, CHARLES E. MAGOON, Governor.

Capt. GEORGE R. SHANTON,
Chief of Police, Ancon.

[Translation of cablegram.]

PANAMA, November 20, 1905.

ISTHMIAN, Washington:

Letter from Stevens to me respecting Martinique women says:

"These women consist largely of the wives of laborers who had preceded them coming to our work, and were sent here on the request of their husbands. Some came to fill positions as servants in white families, and some as laundresses and chambermaids, for which there was a demand, and all were brought with only the above objects in view, precisely as white women have come from the States under similar conditions, to join their husbands, and as nurses, et cetera. Nearly every one of these families was known personally to our representative in Martinique, and care was taken to include only those who came for legitimate purposes, and to my belief the selection was justified by the results. You can hear any sort of a rumor on the Isthmus, and the one you refer to is entitled to just as much credence as any of them—none at all.

"At the same time, it must be borne in mind that the situation as regards social and family relations among the island blacks differs entirely from that which obtains among white people generally. Thousands of men and women in these islands live together their lives long and never go through the marriage ceremony, but they are recognized as man and wife, and all their family relations are based on the above arrangement. In fact, the proportion of illegitimate children (illegitimate according to our standard) in some of the largest and most populous islands is 80 per cent. Still the families so constituted form the unit of the social and political life of the islands, and from their point of view, from which it is entirely proper to judge them, are entitled to just as much respect as our people who happen to be born and live in another country and under different conditions.

"You can absolutely and unqualifiedly deny any other purpose in bringing these women to the Isthmus, excepting an absolutely legitimate and honest one. Our effort is to establish our blacks as well as whites in old home relations, so that a feeling of stability and contentment, with consequent better work, will result."

MAGOON.

ISTHMIAN CANAL ZONE, EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Ancon, November 22, 1905.

MY DEAR SHONTS: Referring to my letter to you of November 16, relative to the Martinique women who recently arrived on the Isthmus, and to my several cables on the same subject, I inclose herewith a copy of the report of the chief of police, dated November 21, made in compliance with my instructions of November 16.

Very sincerely,

CHARLES E. MAGOON, Governor.
H. D. R.

Hon. THEODORE P. SHONTS,
Chairman Isthmian Canal Commission, Washington, D. C.

(One inclosure: Copy of report of November 21, 1905.)

ISTHMIAN CANAL ZONE, HEADQUARTERS POLICE DEPARTMENT,
Ancon, November 21, 1905.

Hon. CHARLES E. MAGOON,
Governor Canal Zone, Ancon.

SIR: Referring to your letter of recent date relative to the women who arrived in Colon from Martinique October 30, 1905, I have the honor to report as follows:

A great many of these women have relatives working on the Canal Zone and most of the balance are working at the various hotels along the line, are employed as domestics in the families of employees of the Isthmian Canal Commission, or are living with some one man exclusively. The balance find employment as laundresses.

As a class these women are neat, clean, and industrious, and the records of this department show that none of them have been arrested for any cause whatever. Of the entire number which have arrived on the Canal Zone not more than three or four are common prostitutes.

Approximately these women are distributed along the line and are employed as follows:

Station.	Married, living with husband.	Single working for private families.	Working for isthmian canal hotels.	Single, not employed.	Living with men, not married.	Laundresses.	Total.
Corozal		7	9			24	40
Pedro Miguel	6	1	20				27
Paraiso	1	1	2	10	11		25
Cucaracha	5				23		28
Culebra	11	13	14				38
Las Cascadas	4	7					11
Bas Obispo	18	2					20
Matachin	6						6
Gorgona	2	5	3				10
Lirio	25						25
Cirio	20						20
Cuneta	4				17		21
Chagres	24						24
Total	126	36	48	10	51	24	295

In conclusion I wish to say that I think bringing these women in is a move in the right direction, as it tends to make the men more contented and their presence causes the laborers to be more orderly and industrious than formerly.

Very respectfully, GEORGE R. SHANTON.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, November 25, 1905.

MY DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of November 16, inclosing a copy of a letter of November 14 addressed to Chief Engineer Stevens, a copy of an order issued November 16 to the chief of the Zone police, and a copy of a cablegram sent to Chairman Shonts with reference to the rumor that 150 Martinique women have been brought to the Zone and distributed among the employees for immoral purposes.

I have read your letters and entirely concur in the policy favored by you in your letter to Engineer Stevens.

Very respectfully, WM. H. TAFT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. CHARLES E. MAGOON,
Governor of the Canal Zone, Ancon, Panama.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 18, 1905.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. Joseph C. Sibley, a Member-elect from the Twenty-eighth district of Pennsylvania, appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

An act (H. R. 480) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, and making appropriations for isthmian canal construction, and for other purposes.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House from the Speaker's table the following House bill with Senate amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 480. An act supplemental to an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, and making appropriations for isthmian canal construction, and for other purposes.

The amendments were read.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Senate amendments to House bill 480 be nonconcurred in and that a conference be asked.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks that the Senate amendments be nonconcurred in and a conference asked.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield a minute?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before you put that motion to the House would the gentleman make an explanation to the House of the character of the Senate amendments? The bill has come over from the Senate so suddenly the House is not acquainted with the character of the amendments.

Mr. HEPBURN. It leaves out the bond provision entirely and makes no other very important change. It requires estimates for annual salaries. The amendments, as the gentleman may have noticed, are not of a very important character except those of which I have spoken.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does it leave out the requirement for borrowing the money and leave it within the discretion of the Secretary, as it is now by law, to pay it from money out of the Treasury?

Mr. HEPBURN. It omits that section.
Mr. WILLIAMS. It omits that section entirely?
Mr. HEPBURN. That is my understanding.
Mr. WILLIAMS. It omits the proviso I moved to strike out on the floor?
Mr. HEPBURN. I think it omits the entire section as I understand it. I have not examined it carefully, but that is what I gather simply from the statements in the newspapers and the reading now. The whole of the first section is omitted I understand.
Mr. WILLIAMS. I see. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has called my attention to it. It leaves the proviso for reimbursement out of the proceeds of the bonds in the bill.
Mr. HEPBURN. My understanding is that the whole section goes out with the Senate amendment.
Mr. WILLIAMS. I have the bill now as it came. I see on page 2, line 13, that the language is in the bill, and this bill, if it is passed as it comes from the Senate, will require the issuance of bonds and leave the money on deposit in national banks which might be used for construction. With that stricken out I was going to move to amend by moving to concur, but as that is still in the bill, and in my opinion it is a very vicious thing, I hope it will go to committee for conference.
The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].
Mr. BARTLETT rose.
The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]?
Mr. HEPBURN. I do.
Mr. BARTLETT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if there is a probability that the report of the conference that is asked for now will be made before Thursday?
Mr. HEPBURN. I can give the gentleman no information on that subject.
Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman from Iowa another question? It is this: When the bill was up in the House originally the statement was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], stated positively, that there was no such thing as a press agent employed at $10,000 a year in the service of the Commission. I have not been able to see the amendment this morning. Does the amendment offered by the Senate dispose or prohibit or lessen the salary that was paid to Mr. Bishop, whatever his capacity was, who was employed by the Commission?
Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman will have to repeat his question; there was so much confusion that I could not understand.
Mr. BARTLETT. What I asked the gentleman was this: It was stated last week, when the bill was up originally, by the gentleman from Illinois, in reply to an inquiry by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], that there was no such employee in the employment of the Isthmian Canal Commission as a press agent. Now, it has already been developed, in the testimony offered before the Senate committee, that Mr. Bishop was employed, at a salary of $10,000, to perform some duties in the capacity of a historian or creator of public sentiment in behalf of the interests of the Canal Commission or the canal project. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] if the Senate, by amendment, struck off or prohibited the employment of any person in that capacity or reduced his salary? I saw it stated in a report of the evidence before the Senate Committee on Appropriations that this gentleman was both secretary and "historian" of the Commission.
Mr. HEPBURN. So far as I am advised——
Mr. BARTLETT. I will say further——
Mr. HEPBURN. So far as I am advised, the amendments of the Senate do not refer to the subject the gentleman has referred to.
Mr. BARTLETT. Permit me to say that the testimony before the Senate committee developed the fact that a gentleman by the name of Mr. Bishop, who was secretary, or something of that sort, was employed at a salary of $10,000 for some purpose which was stated on the floor of this House, to act in the nature of a press agent, and it was testified to by him and also testified to by the chairman of the Commission that his duties were rather in the nature I have stated. I do not want to take the time of the gentleman, but I have the testimony before me.
Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know anything as to the state of facts that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] thinks justifies his statement. I know of nothing of that kind. I do not know of any press agent having been employed. I think the gentleman's statement of denial was accurate.
Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] not know that before the Senate Committee on Appropriations it appeared without question that the gentleman to whom I referred when this bill was before the House was employed practically to devote all his time to the Commission as a press agent and historian?
Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know anything of that kind. I heard no testimony to that effect. I do not believe there was any such testimony as that. This gentleman had certain duties which he performed in the nature or line of duty to which the gentleman referred. He was the historian of the Commission and he was secretary of the board. Those were his major duties. These other were merely incidental.
Mr. FITZGERALD. I have read the testimony of the gentleman before the Senate committee.
Mr. HEPBURN. I do not care to yield to a controversy of this kind at this time. We are ready to take care of that matter when the proper time comes.
Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker——
Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?
Mr. HEPBURN. I yield to a question.
Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit me to put into the RECORD the testimony upon that subject now under discussion as a part of my remarks?
Mr. HEPBURN. Not now. Read the testimony.
Mr. BARTLETT. Permit me to read it.
Mr. HEPBURN. No. When the gentleman has the floor he can adopt such plan as he chooses.
Mr. FITZGERALD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the Chair state when it will be proper to interrogate the gentleman from Iowa upon questions affecting this bill?
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa declines to yield.
Mr. FITZGERALD. "The gentleman from New York" desires to obtain information from the gentleman from Iowa about this bill.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will not reply in debate. Does the gentleman yield?
Mr. HEPBURN. "The gentleman" will not yield for the purpose of informing the gentleman from New York.
Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Is it not the duty of the chairman of a committee reporting a bill or a conference report to explain it to the House before he calls upon the House to act upon it? I distinctly remember Senator Sherman in the Senate declared that it is his duty.
The SPEAKER. On the parliamentary question the Chair begs to differ with the gentleman. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor.
Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the Chair rule that it is not the duty of the chairman to make that statement?
The SPEAKER. What motion does the gentleman from Iowa desire to make?
Mr. HEPBURN. I move the previous question.
Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend for a moment. The gentleman from Iowa moves the previous question upon the motion that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.
The question was taken; and the previous question was ordered.
The question was taken; and the Senate amendments were disagreed to, and a conference was asked.
The SPEAKER announced the appointment of the following conferees: Mr. HEPBURN, Mr. PAYNE, and Mr. LIVINGSTON.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leaves of absence were granted as follows:
To Mr. COCKRAN, indefinitely, on account of illness.
To Mr. GRANGER, for this week, on account of illness.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House resolution 42.
The motion was agreed to.
The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania in the chair.
The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House resolution 42.
Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, as a policy holder, I arise to discuss insurance. It has received more attention during this session than all other questions, and this is as it should be, because the people are giving it more thought than all others. It is our greatest problem. I call it such because the amount of insurance now in force in the United States is more than twelve billions of dollars. This is more than the public debts of Germany, the United Kingdom, France, and the United States combined. It is more than all the individual deposits in National, State, and private banks, and loan and trust companies. It is five times greater than all the money in circulation in the United States. What a monument to thrift! What an invitation to plunder! What a call to duty!

This Republic has ten million policy holders, twenty million policies, and at least forty million people, half her population, directly interested in this matter. The labor, the economy, and the plans of years are all involved.

The most eminent suggestion is that Congress shall pass a law declaring insurance to be an article of interstate commerce, or incident to it, and thus confer Federal authority over all life insurance corporations doing business outside the States where they are organized. Such a law would do three things: It would give the nation supervision of their management, and their control. It would relieve the corporations, in part at least, from the expense and inconvenience of different State regulations. It would enable the Government at Washington to retaliate against foreign countries doing business here in the event their parent countries should discriminate against American countries doing business there.

The first object alone is vital. The second and third are relatively unimportant. The annual expense to all the life insurance corporations in the United States resulting from State control is about eight millions of dollars. More than this amount was spent last year by one great New York life insurance corporation for new business, over and above all of its premiums on such new business; and as respects foreign business, it is in the opinion of the ablest authorities a loss at best. In the light of our recent unhappy experience, it certainly is folly. [Applause.]

Such a law is of questionable constitutionality, and this country does not ask for a law suit. It asks for a result. It does not desire the infinite verbosity of constitutional lawyers. It is in no mood to listen to the deep thunder of profundity or contemplate atmospheric phenomena in the mist of precedent. It asks for the clear light of publicity, and nothing more. And it needs nothing more.

Should the Supreme Court declare life insurance not to be an article of interstate commerce, or incident to it, then we are undone, for the Constitution will not be amended for this purpose. It would take longer to amend the Constitution than to build a battle ship, and public interest could not be sustained. More than a year would pass before a law could be enacted, a case prepared, and a decision had. Two more years would follow before a resolution could be presented to the States and three-fourths of them return it with their ratification.

Time has a fine contempt for everything except a crisis, and in her potter's field rest the forms of many impulses more imposing in their prime than this. [Applause.]

And all this upon the assumption that there will be no positive opposition. This assumption is unfounded. There would be opposition. More than one-fourth of our States hold it a fundamental duty to resist the increase of Federal power at the expense of State power. In addition, the great majority of our people are disgusted with that form of hysteria which calls for a constitutional amendment every time the wind changes. And to this number I am happy to belong.

Then, let us say, the constitutionality of the interstate commerce proposition is a question, and an amendment to the Constitution nothing but a dream. Let us also say that the only value of the interstate-commerce idea is the opportunity it would afford for publicity, for giving the General Government power to supervise the operation and control of these great institutions.

We can enact this provision into law and leave State control undisturbed. We can do it in a way which leads past the courthouse straight back to national confidence. I believe the bill which I have introduced will accomplish this result.

Subject these corporations to national supervision and the eagle will keep the vulture from plucking the bodies of the dead. [Applause.]

Congress has unquestioned power to legislate for the District of Columbia, the Territories, and for our insular possessions, and all of these great insurance companies do business in some of these places.

True, a statehood bill may leave no Territories. In the future our power to legislate for our insular possessions may be abridged. But, gentlemen, the District of Columbia will always remain with us. Congress will always have, under the Constitution, the power to exercise exclusive jurisdiction in all cases whatsoever in the District of Columbia. This District of Columbia, this little District of Columbia, less than ten miles square, offers a solution of this question, offers the field for a display of that moral force and influence which will compel all the life insurance companies in the United States to come here and of their own volition invite the supervision and scrutiny of the Government. Enact into law the salient features of this bill and the life insurance companies of this Republic will be compelled, for prudential reasons, to not only invite but advertise Government supervision. They would hurry here, if not here already, in order that the agents soliciting business out in the States might possess the one absolutely essential asset of a life insurance solicitor in the future, namely, the proud and confident assurance that the books of his company are constantly open to rigid inspection. Every life insurance company in this Republic would be compelled to come here, write business, submit to Federal supervision, or go out of business. In other words, enact into law the salient features of this bill and this problem will solve itself.

I have a bill creating a division of insurance in the Department of Commerce and Labor, and providing for a superintendent of insurance and subordinate officials. This bill provides, among other things, that all corporations doing life insurance business in the District of Columbia shall file with the superintendent a sworn report on the first day of September of each year, thus enabling the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor to place it in his annual report to Congress.

This report shall contain a complete, classified, and itemized statement of all assets and liabilities.

This would disclose any scandalous perversion of funds.

This would prevent, for instance, any life insurance corporation from holding ninety million dollars' worth of securities marketed by J. P. Morgan & Co.

This would supplant speculation with investment.

This bill provides that this report shall contain a complete, classified, and itemized statement of the amount and character of all business transacted.

This would disclose how far these companies had departed from the original purpose of insurance and wandered off into a maze of more than two hundred forms of policies, puzzling the mind and absolutely defrauding the people.

This bill provides that this report shall give a complete, classified, and itemized statement of the number and character of all policies outstanding, the number and character of all policies issued during the preceding year, and the number and character of all policies forfeited during the preceding year.

This would direct attention to an amazing field of fraud. It would tell the story of conditions misrepresented, of stipulations not understood, of obligations too heavy to be borne, of dishonest estimates of earnings. It will warn the people against the most stupendous trickery of our time, namely, the investment feature of life insurance.

In one of the three great life insurance companies last year only 9,000 policies came to a natural end, 7,000 policies were surrendered, and 33,000 policies lapsed.

This bill provides that this report shall contain a complete, classified, and itemized statement of all dividends paid.

This will disclose whether the cold-blooded robbery of the past is being repeated. Let us hope that it will explain to the inquiring policy holder why his dividend fell from $149 in 1876 to $7 in 1904, and why the dividend of his friend sank from $55 in 1876 to $3 in 1904. Let us also hope that such a provision would make it impossible for a great corporation, whose profits in 1904 were a million dollars greater than in 1903, to pay $200,000 less in dividends than in 1903.

This bill provides that this report shall contain a complete, classified, and itemized statement of all the names of all executive officers, their respective salaries, and their compensation. This will disturb that touch of kin which makes the whole company a Christmas tree. [Laughter and applause.]

These salaries are dishonest, the great majority of them. The New York savings banks held deposits last year amounting to more than a billion dollars, practically the same sum as was paid into the three great life insurance corporations, and yet the total expense of their management, including taxes, was only 50 per cent larger last year than the salaries alone paid in the home offices of these insurance corporations.

This bill provides that this report shall contain a complete, classified, and itemized statement of all receipts and expenditures.

This will throw light upon the salaries of all parasites. It will call the roll of our purchasing agents in every state capitol from Maine to California. It may explain why the printing, stationery, and postage account of one corporation last year was over a million dollars. Think of it! Almost half of the expense of our entire diplomatic and consular service.

It will also inform us whether the lunches we give our executive clerks are satisfactory to them, and whether our banquets to agents in New York and Paris are in keeping with their ancient dignity. We, the absent hosts, of the United States demand that the high standard set by our Hyde ball shall be maintained.

This bill provides that this report shall contain a complete classified and itemized statement of profits and losses with full information as to all profits and losses.

This would turn the searchlight on a multitude of syndicate operations, such as the international marine scheme, which was a wild desire to own the sea as well as the land, the sky having strangely eluded the calculations of these Napoleons of larceny—up to the time, at least, that I was recognized by the Chair. [Laughter.]

This bill provides that this report shall contain a complete classified and itemized statement of all advertising and copies of the same. This will emancipate the magazines and newspapers from the most subtle deception that ever assumed the form of literature.

And in addition another feature should be added. There should be a statement respecting the number of proxies voted at the election of trustees, and the number of policy holders voting in person, and no executive officer should be permitted to cast any ballot but his own.

No feature of this investigation has been more ridiculous than the pretense of mutuality.

A mutual affair is where men band together to give and take, and these companies have been mutual only in this, the policy holders give and the officers take.

On an average only 200 of one New York Insurance Company's 650,000 policy holders record their votes for the election of trustees. In the last ten years the largest vote at any meeting of the New York Life Insurance Company was 2,328, and of this number only 36 policy holders voted in person.

The Metropolitan Insurance Company has 8,000,000 policies outstanding, and at its last election 38,000 policies were recorded as having voted, but in fact only 3 policy holders actually voted in person. This is the source of all mismanagement. It is an endless chain, the officers ask the agents to have policy holders send their proxies to the president he then elects the trustees and they in turn elect him.

Should some policy holder wish to vote he must be very vigilant, for the notice of election is printed only in the New York papers, and the only notice he gets is on the back of the envelope in which his policy is mailed.

This bill provides that the superintendent of insurance may address inquiries to life insurance corporations doing business in the District of Columbia, the Territories, and insular possessions, and full answers must be made thereto, and at his discretion, or on application of a responsible party, the superintendent, or a subordinate named by him, shall make a personal inspection of books and accounts, this power including authority to examine witnesses under oath.

This bill also provides that any corporation shall forfeit its charter to do business in the District of Columbia, the Territories, and insular possessions whenever the superintendent of insurance shall learn that it has indulged in a number of forbidden practices. They shall not make any fictitious sales or loans. This would prevent a future Perkins, as vice-president of an insurance corporation, from buying bad stock from Perkins, as the trusted agent of J. P. Morgan & Co., and later transferring $800,000 worth of it to Morgan & Co. on the 31st of December, 1903, and buying it back on the 1st of January, 1904, in order to make a false report to the State superintendent of insurance.

It would prevent the transfer of a million and a half dollars' worth of industrial stock to a $600 a year messenger in order to deceive the German Empire, which forbids the holding of industrial securities.

This bill provides that no such corporation shall own to exceed 10 per cent of the capital stock of any other corporation.

This will take them out of the saloon business, the hotel business, the banking business, the trust business. It will restrict them to the insurance business.

This bill provides that no executive officer of any such corporation shall hold any office of trust or profit in any other corporation having any business of any kind with the insurance corporation.

This would dissolve the standing pair which Mr. Perkins has had with himself for so many years. [Laughter and applause.]

It will also prevent Mr. Cromwell, the treasurer of one of these corporations, from continuing to be a member of sixteen different syndicates, all of which do business with the insurance corporation with which he is identified.

This bill provides that no corporation shall pay a commission to exceed 40 per cent of the first premium. This is more than enough for honest progress, and if this racing for dishonest supremacy does not end in time it will end in insolvency.

Last year the total premiums on new business in the Equitable were over twelve million dollars, while the expenses of management were over fourteen millions. The new premiums of the Mutual amounted to more than fourteen millions. The expenses of management were over sixteen millions, the total premiums in the New York Life were over sixteen millions, the management expenses were over nineteen millions.

Think of such a corporation paying nine million dollars for new business. Think of another company borrowing fourteen million dollars with which to buy new business.

Thirty years ago the percentage of expense to income for ten large companies was 9 per cent, two years ago it was 19 per cent. And this is why this bill also prevents the giving or taking of any rebate on an insurance premium.

This bill provides that no contribution of any kind shall be made to any political campaign fund.

This will stop the indecent practice of converting private funds for vicious purposes; and from the bottom of my heart I condemn this infamous practice everywhere in the country. [Applause.]

This bill provides that no corporation shall make any investment of any kind or deposit any of its funds without the advice and consent of its board of directors. All of this dishonesty has been the result of arbitrary power.

This will prevent Mr. Harriman from borrowing $27,000,000 to cast into a struggle for the control of the Northern Pacific Railroad.

Arbitrary power to dictate the deposits and investments of these companies makes a king of Wall street, for less than 8 per cent of the assets of these corporations is in real estate. It is quick money. It can be reached in an instant, and this makes the commercial world the prey of these great institutions.

This bill provides that these corporations are forbidden to do anything without the consent of the board of directors, authority over which is given said board of directors by the laws under which the corporation shall have been organized.

Ever since time began arbitrary power has meant nothing but tyranny and shame, and this is why three great companies paid last year the mammoth sum of $49,000,000 for the expense of management. Think of it! More than twice the interest on our national debt, and almost one-half as much as they paid to their policy holders through all channels.

This is plunder, Mr. Chairman, pure and simple. One thing exceeds the perfidy of these offenders, and that is their impudence. All but two or three remain in power. There is not one of them good enough to wear the strips of the felon. For them to remain in office is unspeakable, as unspeakable as for the home wrecker to complacently sit in the ruin he has wrought and calmly invite the American father to return thanks for divine favor.

While no policy should lapse on this account, no man should take a new one in one of these corporations as long as one single remote descendant of Calvary's impenitent thief remains in power. [Applause.]

One of them has gone away. He has gone to Paris. I congratulate him on his conception of propriety. In the midst of all this brazenness his flight is as noteworthy as that of the belated swallow back to the Tropics through the autumn sky.

We send Mr. Hyde to France, not as an ambassador, thank God, nor even in return for the straw which was packed around the body of John Paul Jones. And he might say to our sister Republic that we will gladly exchange with her, for an equal number of honest dead men, to be selected at her own discretion, a band of brigands who seem resigned, but have not. [Applause]

How patient the people are. They know that when the nations united and swept piracy from the sea it planted its flag in the stock exchange. They know the skull and bones have been the coat of arms of brutal wealth in every age. And they should hate it. They should hate it for the genius it has debauched; they should hate it for the havoc it has wrought; they should hate it for the anarchists it has made. Instead it seems they see in it merely the Almighty's caricature of man's supreme stupidity, and they are patient still.

Patient though they be, I want to take away from the death bed of the policy holder the ugly faces of Harriman; Kuhn, Loeb & Co.; the McCurdys, the McCalls, the Perkinses, and Pierpont Morgan, the international kleptomaniac. [Applause and laughter.]

About face, captains of industry, and Cassie Chadwick, daughter of the regiment! [Applause.]

I wish to say a word respecting the professional director in the United States, the embossed-stationery director, the bird's-eye-view director. He is usually a politician who knows nothing except cunning, and is used to decoy the people who have lifted him from obscurity. In business these men are universalists—that is, they are directors in every institution within the zone of their notoriety. Their souls are in pawn, but their names are still for rent. [Applause.] They plead financial success as a demurrer to the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, all we need is reassurance. These companies are solvent, but they charge too much and return too little. This investigation that is going on, these developments that have aroused the country, will prove a blessing, and the publicity which can be secured by this bill will preserve all the fruits of this blessing.

Confidence is not impaired; it is only alert. It has stood unflinchingly on too many fields of war to flee from a band of common thieves. [Applause.] Confidence is not hysterical; it is philosophic. Betray it basely if you will, it calmly counts the loss, repairs the damage, regrets a shattered idol, adds a line to its experience, and serenely goes forth to other duties.

Armies and navies and statesmanship and wealth and art and science are chattels, one and all, alongside of confidence. I do not mean the weather-vane confidence of the ticker, but the confidence of man in man. Old-fashioned confidence, clad in the homespun of common sense, you are the greatest aristocrat that ever stood at the fireside of organized society. [Applause.]

Pass this bill and you have publicity, complete publicity. Have complete publicity and this problem disappears. Publicity will bring regularity, retrenchment, simpleness. Insurance companies will come back to their legitimate field and expenses will decrease. Deferred dividend schemes and other vices will pass away before the searching eye of Government supervision. Publicity will give a sense of fear to all whom God has denied a sense of shame. [Applause.]

This bill will make the District of Columbia the most popular territory in all the world for soliciting insurance. There is a moral force in this measure against which no insurance company, large or small, in this Republic can stand and grow. These great corporations, knowing that their innermost transactions will be given to a country already suspicious, will compete, not for other worlds, but for the approval and esteem of their own land.

It is idle to contend that corporations would evade the provisions of this bill by removing from the District of Columbia, the Territories, or the insular possessions. That would be a confession of dishonesty and they would be branded everywhere.

Publicity is not an experiment—it has been tested in every age and it has never failed. It is but another name for light. It has led humanity from the cave to the cottage. Publicity bore the cross around the world. It has ever been the first instinct of honest human nature. It called our fathers together beneath the oaks and gave us the Magna Charta. It opened the book of faith and closed the lips of superstition. The colonists were unwilling to bear arms against oppression without its aid—without first giving the world their reasons—and the Declaration of Independence came. And when that war was over and Kings and Emperors jested at our feebleness, liberty stepped forward, took the hand of a Republic in rags, and, pointing to the western wilderness, said, "Give me but free speech and a free press and I will lead over mountain and plain, and when the cycle shall be full again I will point to a nation such as dreamer ne'er foretold.

How sacred is publicity's task to-day! What a vast treasure is at stake!

In the early seventies a victorious nation demanded what was thought to be an overwhelming indemnity from its helpless foe, and the admiration of the world burst forth when the payment of that indemnity followed close upon false prophecy. The plain American, thinking of wife and child and future has built for their indemnity against death a sum which is more than twelve times as great as the indemnity which France paid to Germany. What a man he is after all, this plain American.

This vast treasure publicity will protect.

Mr. Chairman, pass this bill and in the future the representative of no life insurance corporation can knock at the door of the lowliest cottage in this Republic and escape the question, "Does your company do business in the District of Columbia?" [Prolonged applause.]

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 48) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1905, on the 20th day of said month; when the Speaker signed the same.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. AMES rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The chair understands that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] acquiesces in the recognition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES]?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. AMES. Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate for me that I have to follow so distinguished a speaker as we have just listened to, and I regret that I have to treat in the few minutes allowed me a plan of insurance regulation along very nearly the lines of the bill so well explained in the last hour. But in order that the Members of the House may know what the Administration has been actually doing along the line of possible and proper control of insurance, I consider it my duty, as well as my pleasure, to submit as briefly as possible the plan which has already received the approval of the Attorney-General of the United States, as well as that, I am given to understand, of the President himself.

Briefly, a code is being drawn, and has been in preparation for some weeks past, with the assistance of the commissioner of insurance of Massachusetts, Mr. Cutting, than whom there is no greater authority in the United States, and with the assistance of the assistant attorney-general of the State of Massachusetts, Mr. Frederick H. Nash, who for six years has fought the insurance battles of Massachusetts against all comers; and this code is a code that embodies in its features all that is just and proper and right and reasonable in the way of insurance laws, combining the best features of the laws of Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, New York, Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, protecting the individual policy holders against every form of abuse, every type of corruption, and at the same time permitting a legitimate insurance business by a corporation.

Now, briefly, starting with such a code, if you can imagine it—for it will be a code of nearly 100 pages in length—starting with such a code the proposed plan is this: To make the District of Columbia, which everyone admits is free from any constitutional question so far as Congressional legislation is concerned, the seat of a national commission of insurance, in the Department of Commerce and Labor. This commission will supervise all insurance companies which would do a business in the District of Columbia. No company to be allowed to do business in the District until it has complied with this code in all of its requirements. More than that, no company will be allowed to do business in the District until it has received a certificate of authority from the insurance commissioner to the effect that the company has complied with this code. And more than that—and in this, gentlemen, is the crux of the whole proposition—this certificate of authority shall be revoked unless these insurance companies conduct their business in the several States according to the code laid down by Congress for the District of Columbia. What will be the effect of this? It establishes a black list of companies not willing to do an honest business. The actual business of insurance in the District will amount to nothing; but it sets a standard for honest and legitimate business, and a company that is unwilling to come within this code is a wild-cat company. Public opinion will do the rest. It permits a company to do a legitimate business, and by a legitimate business I mean an honest business, such as our national banking business. In my State of Massachusetts the law provides that a street-railway corporation shall not be allowed to declare more than 8 per cent dividends on its capital stock, and in that State no stock watering is allowed. That might be legitimate business.

In the manufacturing business, in cotton and in woolens, we would be glad to be assured of 6 per cent on the capital actually invested in plant and equipment year in and year out. There are plenty of insurance companies that would be willing to conduct their business on a 6 per cent profit—a legitimate business—turning all other surplus beyond that necessary to safeguard the interests of the insured over to the policy holder and saving none for a corruption fund. That, in brief, is the scheme. The code—and a just and proper code is the prime requisite in the bill—has been under way some weeks; and I hope shortly after the holiday recess to present a bill incorporating a complete and most carefully drawn code that will meet with the approval of all the insurance commissioners of the United States—and I have no doubt of all honest insurance companies—and you will have before the House a scheme already approved by the Attorney-General and, I have been given to understand, meets the most cordial support the Administration. [Applause.]

I only regret the ten minutes allowed me has expired, and I thank the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] for his kindness.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, we have before us for our consideration a resolution distributing the message of the President of the United States to the various committees of the House. For some days I have listened with much interest to the speeches made on one question considered in the President's message. From the discussion which has taken place about this message, one might be led to believe that there was but one question involved that could awake the interest of this House—the clause relating to insurance. I believe the question of insurance is a vital one. It is a new question in Federal legislation, one that should be considered carefully and well. But I believe that there are more important questions before this House to-day than that of regulating insurance companies. There are issues that come more closely to the homes of the people than even the insurance discussion. You might say that insurance only involves the rich; at least you can say insurance only involves the homes of those who are well-to-do, because it is only the well-to-do classes that pay the premiums on life insurance, and therefore are directly interested in that matter.

But there is a suggestion in the President's message that involves the homes of the poor, which involves the question of wages, which involves the question of competition for everyday work; and in my humble opinion that suggestion is of far more vital importance to the American people than even this great question of life insurance and regulation of life insurance companies can ever be. It is no new question to American legislation, and yet, although the matter has been repeatedly brought before Congress, that body has failed up to this time to pass legislation that would effectively regulate it and protect the American people. I refer to that portion of the President's message that calls the attention of Congress to the suggestion that the immigration coming into this country from foreign lands should be restricted and regulated.

Members of the House, I want to say that there is a very strong sentiment in this House, a dominant sentiment, that we shall not change the present tariff law. There are many of us on this side of the House who consider the present tariff laws a detriment rather than a benefit to the country, believing that they hold back the march of progress. But a majority of the House for the last eight years have shown that they are unwilling to change the tariff laws. Why? Because they say we are in an era of prosperity, that that prosperity brings work to the American workman and wages to the American laborer, and they will not interfere with present conditions. They say it comes from the protection that has been given our manufacturers under the Dingley bill; yet they are leaving the sluice gates wide open for indiscriminate immigration to come into this country, for the pauper labor of the world to come into competition in American factories and on American farms with American labor [applause], contrary to the very essence of the argument that they make that the protection of American labor is secured by the protective-tariff theories of the Republican party. It is argued by those in favor of admitting all immigrants that it was by that policy that we built up this country; that it was through the admission of immigrants without restriction into America that this great country was settled and developed. We are all bound to admit that we can count back in the course of four or five generations to the original immigrants who came from the old country to establish our line here. But I want to say that the question of immigration in the past and the question of immigration to-day are entirely different problems to consider. They are as different as black is from white; and why? Because we are receiving an entirely different kind of people. We may want, and do want, immigration of our blood, of our kith and kin, to develop and build up this country; but we do not want immigrants to come into this country who will tear down the American standard of life, of living and of wages, who are of inferior races to our own, who have been oppressed and pauperized for so many centuries that they are unable to maintain the high ideals of American citizenship.

The early history of the immigration coming to this country shows that it came from the people of Celtic and Teutonic blood. It came from northern Europe. It came from those people who have created the present civilization of the world. The facts show that the immigration coming to America to-day is not of the Teutonic and Celtic peoples, but it is from the Slav, the Iberic, and the Mongolian races in larger proportions than it is of the blood of northern Europe. What is the difference? We find that in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, 1,026,000 immigrants came into the United States, a greater number than the entire number of immigrants that came to this country from the settlement of Jamestown down to the adoption of the Declaration of Independence—more people coming into the United States in one year than all who came prior to the establishment of our independent Government. That immense number should cause the American people to look well to the question as to who are making up this vast immigration coming here to mix their blood with our blood and with whom we must ultimately assimilate.

In the early history of the country the immigrants came to America for a different reason than that which brings them here now. In the beginning of our settlement they came here to free themselves from the oppression of bad government in Europe. They belonged to that same independent race of men of the Aryan blood who, when they left their homes in the Caucasian Mountains, came with the idea already embedded in their hearts and minds of the glories of self-government. When those wild tribes first came to Europe they elected their own chiefs. When a leader was killed in battle, his son did not succeed him, but the candidates for the office laid their shields on the turf, and the warriors, the electors of their day, threw their swords into the shield of the man that they desired to follow, and the man who received the greatest number of swords was the chief and the ruler from that day on.

They brought that principle with them from the Caucasus Mountains. It has been embedded in them to this day. It is the same principle that worked in the blood of the American patriot when he drew his sword for independence at Bunker Hill and at Yorktown. In other words, it is what is in the blood that makes a people great and prosperous. God Almighty did not create all animals equal. He created some strong and some weak. He did not create all races of men equal. He created some intelligent and some unintelligent, some brave and some cowardly, some thrifty and some lazy.

Practically all of the immigrants who came to this country before 1880 were from northern Europe. They were of the Teutonic and Celtic origin. They did not come because they were assisted by others; they did not come because somebody paid their way to get them out of their old country, but they came here because they wanted to live in a free country. They came here to get rid of the oppressions of their old home. They came here, themselves raising the money that it cost them to move their families to America. They came here facing the terrors of an unknown ocean, and cut their way through a primeval forest, facing savage tribes, to build their homes and to establish this Republic.

As long as there were any homestead lands left in the West to be taken up and to be made into homes, that immigration still continued from northern Europe—continued to come from people of our kith and kin, people whom we could absorb and make a part of us in one generation. But when that class of immigrant could no longer find a homestead here on which to build his home and found his independence, he ceased to come. When the great steamship companies of the world found that the immigration was falling off, which had been very profitable to them, they felt it was necessary for their business to keep it up. They found that the immigrant from northern Europe was no longer willing to come, because the inducements that in former years brought him to America no longer existed. Then they put their agents in the field to bring not good immigration, but to bring any immigration they could get, for the sole purpose of the profit derived from the money paid for the steerage passage, and not for the benefit of America or the upbuilding of our Republic. It then became a question of who was it easiest for them to get. It was that class of people who were most discontented with their home surroundings, who were most oppressed and downtrodden at home, and who therefore were most willing to leave.

And it was in that field they sent their agents to secure the immigration that make the profits for their great companies. I am informed, and I am sure that the facts are true, that the steamship companies entering New York in the last year made over $25,000,000 of profit off of the steerage immigrants they brought into this country. That is the inducement for them to bring in the class of people that we now find coming here, and when they come here they are here for good or for bad. If they are of benefit to the country, we derive the benefit; if they are of injury, we suffer that injury.

Now, the contention that I make is that we should take care of our own people first. The argument is often made that this is a free country; that we should open our arms to everyone; that America should be the home of the downtrodden and the oppressed of all lands. That is a beautiful sentiment, one worthy of those who utter it; but my idea is that the true way to live, the true way to push forward civilization and Christianity, is to build up the best standards and not tear them down. I believe that our first duty is to our home people. Show me the man who does not think his first duty is to his home and his fireside and I will show you a man who is too cowardly to protect that home and that fireside. [Applause.] Show me the man who is not loyal to his own State before he extends his loyalty or friendship to some other State and I will show you a man that is unworthy the State that gave him birth. Show me a man that does not believe that the Stars and Stripes that fly over this Capitol are the emblem of the greatest nation on God's earth and I will show you a man that is unworthy of American citizenship. [Applause.]

It is that which makes us a great nation. It is that reason which makes us the great race that we have always been—loyal to ourselves and loyal to our people. It is because we have refused to mix our blood with the blood of an inferior people that we to-day stand at the head of the world's civilization.

If the immigration coming into this country is a menace to American citizens, to American people, is it not our duty to stop it now? I want to call your attention to a few sentences that the President uses in his message in reference to this question that goes right to the meat of the question. He says:

> What we should desire to find out is the individual quality of the individual man. In my judgment, with this end in view, we shall have to prepare through our own agents a far more rigid inspection in the countries from which the immigrants come. It will be a great deal better to have fewer immigrants, but all of the right kind, than a great number of immigrants, many of whom are necessarily of the wrong kind. As far as possible we wish to limit the immigration to this country to persons who propose to become citizens of this country, and we can well afford to insist upon adequate scrutiny of the character of those who are thus proposed for future citizenship.

Now, are we doing it? Are we scrutinizing those who propose to come here for future citizenship? I find that the report of the Commissioner-General of Immigration for this year—that is, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905—shows that of the 1,026,000 immigrants that came into this country only 221,000 were of Teutonic origin, 124,000 of Celtic origin, and the balance were either Slavic, Iberic, or Mongolian origin, people of a different blood from ours and a different race. You say that may not affect us; that we are able to absorb these people and have them become a part of us. If 1,000,000 comes this year—and it has been gradually increasing from year to year—in ten years it will amount to 10,000,000 immigrants, two-thirds of whom are people of a race different from ours and inferior to ours. We must absorb them. A million a year in ten years will amount to more than one-tenth of the population of the United States.

Mr. GOULDEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCREARY of Pennsylvania). Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman what per cent of immigration coming here return home again—of that 1,026,000 what per cent does the gentleman estimate will return within the next five years?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not ascertained the percentage.

Mr. GOULDEN. Then I will give it to the gentleman. It is 40 per cent. Forty per cent return and 60 per cent remain. Now, Mr. Chairman, one more inquiry, if the gentleman will permit me. I live in New York City and have made a study of this matter—have been to Ellis Island a number of times in the last year. Is the gentleman aware that the demand for laborers—those doing the lowest manual labor—is so great that it is necessary that the immigration be kept up to the present number of good, honest, healthy men and women?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I am not.

Mr. GOULDEN. It is a fact nevertheless.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It may be a fact from the standpoint that the gentleman looks at it, but the standpoint from which he looks at it is the standpoint of wealth and not of humanity.

Mr. GOULDEN. No; it is not; but from that of absolute necessity of the times.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am looking at it from the standpoint of the man who earns his daily bread by his daily work. [Applause.] I will say to the gentleman right here, and that is where the issue comes in this question, I would rather let the factory and the furnace and the plantation wait a reasonable length of time to make its development than I would to drive American citizens to Canada in order that they may get homes because they can not compete with the class of labor that is coming into the United States to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. GOULDEN. Does the gentleman know that out of the 400,000 or more coal miners at least 75 per cent are foreigners?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, I know that; but most of them are the right kind of foreigners.

Mr. GOULDEN. It is almost impossible to get anyone to do ordinary manual labor and the work of necessity unless you get it through our ports of admission for immigrants.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. STANLEY. Is not that true, I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN], because of the various injunctions that have been issued by mine owners against native men who at various times have struck, and then these people have been brought here in cattle cars by the contract and by the head to supplant the different places of the American laborer? If that is not the case in New York, it is to a shameful degree in Kentucky. [Applause.]

Mr. GOULDEN. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to yield to my friends, but I do not want to yield for a controversy outside of the line of my speech.

Mr. GOULDEN. I only want to say that I believe the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] is at times true, but it is a condition and not a theory that confronts us now, and my figures are taken from the report of the Commissioner of Immigration at Ellis Island, Mr. Watchorn, a gentleman who rose from the position of a coal miner to the position he holds to-day, and who is an authority on these matters.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have the report of the Commissioner of Immigration before me on my desk, and I know that there is a certain class of immigrants coming to this country who ultimately intend to return to Europe. A large number of Italian immigrants who come to this country return, as do a great many of the Chinese and Japanese. That may lessen the numbers that stay here, but, according to the gentleman's own figures, of the men that came last year 600,000 would remain, and we would have the same problem, maybe in a little less degree, but the same problem of assimilating those people and raising them to American standards. Now, look at the difference. You say that it makes no difference, but why does this condition obtain? The people of northern Europe have not mixed their blood with any alien race. They are still the pure, white blood, the people of the Aryan race who came down from the Caucasian Mountains. In southern Europe we find the Iberic race. It is a well-known fact in history that the Spaniard, the Italian, the Greek, and the Assyrian have mixed their bloods with the races of Asia and of Africa for many generations past. They are not of the pure white race, and when we mix with them we also are not of the pure Aryan race. Consider what is the difference in the civilization produced by these different races of people. The Iberic race, the Spaniards, settled South America. The civilization of South America is a Spanish civilization. It is the civilization of that mixed race. What do we find there? We find the so-called "republics" are military despotisms. We find them far behind the progress of the world in the arts, in agriculture, and in mechanics. It is not that they have not great fertile plains or rich mines or great rivers to carry their commerce to the sea, but they are a race of people who are not up to the high standard of the Teutonic and Celtic races in the fight for progress and civilization. Compare them with North America, that has been peopled by the races of northern Europe, where we find the highest type of republican form of government that the world has ever produced and the greatest Christian civilization that the world has ever known. You have a fair comparison of the two races of people there.

Now, do you wish to have the standards of North America pulled down to the standards of South America? If you mix the same blood in the veins of the people of North America to-day that is found in South America, of necessity you will pull them down to that standard. It is just as much a folly to claim that we will not lower American standards by admitting to this country the immigration that has lower standards than ours as it is to say that you will not destroy the breed of thoroughbred Kentucky horses by breeding with them a Texas broncho pony. But, as I said, take the history of these people and you find that the people who came here from northern Europe and settled this country went to the farms. They wanted independence; they wanted their own homes. They cleared away the forests, they developed the country, they built the railroads, and they developed new markets for our manufactured products. You take the settlement of Minnesota by the Norwegians and Swedes. They were from northern Europe, and many of them to-day can not speak the English language, but they have made a great State. They have developed the lands of that State, they have produced markets for us, and they are rapidly becoming assimilated and a part of the American people; but you take the immigration that is coming here to-day, only one-third of whom are from northern Europe, and what do you find? Are they going out to the West and developing the farm; are they making new markets? No; under the present system that is bringing this class of immigration to America it is the weakest who come. It is those who can not stand alone at home, and by reason of the very small cost of bringing them to this country they come here, in many cases, assisted by those in foreign countries who desire to get rid of them. They do not go out and develop the farm. They are not the class who build the railroads, and, as a rule, they are not the class who go into the mines, but they are the class who become the tramps and the organ grinders of the great cities. Of the immigrants who came to this country last year, I find that 31 per cent of them remained in the great State of New York, 7 per cent in Massachusetts, 20 per cent in Pennsylvania, and 5 per cent in New Jersey; four States retained 63 per cent of them, and I find that Illinois retained 7 per cent and Ohio 5 per cent, making a total of 75 per cent of those immigrants who came to this country remaining in those six States of the Union.

Now, why? In the early history of the settlement of this country the immigrants who came here, the immigrants of our blood and kin, went all over the United States. They went to the frontier and faced the dangers of the Indian war and the hardships of the frontier country and built their homes, but of this class of immigrants coming to-day we find 75 per cent of them located in six of the great States of the Union; and why? Because in those great States we find the great cities of New York, Philadelphia, Jersey City, Chicago, Boston, and Cincinnati. It means that they have gone to the cities and not to the farms. It means that they have gone where they could find the easiest prop to rest on, because they could not stand alone. Now, what must be the result? They are becoming charges upon the people of those States. The statistics show that there is a much greater per cent of aliens in our reformatory and charitable institutions than there is of Americans. I find from the statistical reports that in the penal, reformatory, and charitable institutions of the United States there are 349,000 inmates. Of those inmates 97,000, or 28 per cent, are of foreign birth. Compare the number of foreign-born people in this country with the number of American-born people in it, and then realize that nearly one-third of the inmates of our penal and charitable institutions are of foreign birth, which conclusively demonstrates that the class of immigrants coming into this country are not up to the American standards or American ideals of life or living; and even more, that when they come here we must be charged with their support and maintenance in the greater number of cases.

That being the case, what is the result when they come in competition with the American workmen? That is the real question. My friend from New York has said that we need these immigrants; that we need them all. I know and am willing to admit that there is a greater demand probably for labor in the country than there ever has been, but there is a greater prosperity in America to-day than there ever has been. There is more surplus capital in America to-day than there ever has been, and necessarily there is a great demand for labor. I wish this condition would last forever; but it will not, my friends. It may be a year, it may be a decade, but in the end this condition will not continue. Hard times will ultimately come around, furnaces and factories will close, and when that time comes who will be the laborer that is employed? He will be the man who can work the cheapest.

Now, is that man who can work the cheapest the American laborer of our blood and kith and kin, or is he the laborer of foreign importation? The American laborer has a high standard, the highest standard, probably, in the world of any laboring man. He believes that he has got a right to a good home for himself and his family, to such wages as will enable him to properly clothe his children and give them good schooling, and have separate rooms for his boys and his girls, and he ought to live up to that standard. The man who denies that proposition is unworthy of his American birth. But, on the other hand, the class of immigrants that are coming in here to compete with the American laborer is a class of people who for hundreds of years have been downtrodden and oppressed in their own homes in the old country. They are people many of whom live to-day in America in one room in the tenements of the big cities and are satisfied with their condition. They are people many of whom I am informed do not wish their children to go to school. They are a people who live on the coarsest food. Well, now, my friend, when the day comes that the furnaces and factories go out of blast, when the farms have bad crops, I want to ask you which of these laborers is going to hold his job, the laborer of our kith and kin, whose fathers helped build this Republic, whose fathers carried the American battle flag in the war of the Revolution, who faced the dangers of the frontier and cleared away the forest, drove back the Indian, and founded our Republic, or the laborer that comes to-day from the oppressed classes of Europe? Why, you know and I know when that day comes the man who will work the cheapest will hold his job. The man who can work the cheapest will be found willing to work the cheapest. And you will find that the laborers of southern Europe, the people who have been downtrodden and oppressed for years, will take the places of American workmen and the latter will be driven to the soup houses. They will go to British America, as they are doing to-day and have gone in the past, to find homes, because they can not find work in America, and because they can not stand the competition of this class of labor you are leaving your doors open to receive to-day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what I wish to say is this: That I believe the Congress of the United States is willing to pass a bill to protect the American laborer from this unfair competition. But in the past we have never been able to get a Committee on Immigration to report a bill to the House for the House to act upon. In the Fifty-seventh Congress, when that committee had a bill before the House dealing with other questions, I offered an amendment seeking to restrict the tidal wave of European immigration coming into this country, and the House by more than a three-fourths vote adopted the amendment. Unfortunately, it found its resting place in a committee of the Senate and was never heard from again. Of course, we all know there is a great pressure by the steamship lines to induce immigration to come into this country and opposition to any law cutting off the number of immigrants. It is worth $25,000,000 a year to them for it to continue. But the American workman has a right to protection against that class of labor. The only place where he can get protection is in this House. This House can not act unless the committee charged with the consideration of these bills reports them to the House.

Therefore, in the beginning of the session, when we are considering the President's message, I take this opportunity to bring this question before the House, for fear that if the House does not take it up and voice the sentiment of the American people in favor of protecting the American workman against the pauper labor of Europe we will never have any action in the matter at all. It is for this reason that I am taking up the time of the House to-day. [Loud applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question. I did not hear all of his remarks.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The accomplishment of your purpose will have to be obtained by making additional restrictions?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Since the beginning of this session of Congress I have introduced a bill increasing the per capita tax to $20; it is only $2 now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my colleague from Alabama I think that is right. I did not go into the discussion of how we should restrict the immigration at this time, because I did not care to go into the discussion of a bill which I introduced and that passed the House at one time, but was defeated in the Senate. I think there are but two ways to meet the question. One is along the line of the bill I offered some years ago, which provided for an educational test; in that way I think we will get the best class of immigrants from the different countries. It required that each immigrant should be able to read and write some portion of the Constitution of the United States. The other was to increase the head tax, as my colleague has suggested; and I do not think $25 is too high at all—the amount he has put in his bill. The most undesirable class of immigrants that we have to-day, of which there is a large number, is the assisted immigrant. That is an immigrant who has his way paid for him by somebody else. The assisted immigrant is a weak immigrant. We want the strong. When you put the head tax high you will eliminate the weak, and only the strong will come.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The assisted immigrant that you refer to is the one who is assisted by some relative who comes to this country and who by his intelligence earns enough to be able to send back to the old country for any relative. Do you not think, as you have just said, that it is the most undesirable class of immigration to come into this country? Do you not think that restriction ought to be increased and the degree of relationship narrowed down to father and mother, son and daughter, and not to general relationship?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do, because the statistics show that the tax on immigrants, assisted immigrants, makes it possible that they may include cousins who are so far removed that you can not trace any relationship at all.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And thereby a great many of their neighbors are brought into this country in that way.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think a great many are.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That is my information.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no criticism to make of my colleague's bill. If you had doubled the amount that you had put in your bill, making it $50 rather than $25, then we would be sure to eliminate the assisted immigrant; and also providing in the law that the immigrant should be able to read and write, then we would only have the most intelligent come here to compete with American laborers; and it goes without saying that the most intelligent would hold up American standards.

Mr. McNARY. Before the gentleman sits down, I would like to ask him whether the statement which I have frequently read in the newspapers, that the South wants immigration, is correct or not, and whether he does not believe that the large amount of prosperity which has been enjoyed in the Northern and Western States from the time of the war on has been largely due to the immigration to those uncleared territories; and would he kindly explain, if the South does not want immigration, what it does want to supplant the negro labor which we have heard so often spoken of by gentlemen from that section?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to say this, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts: In the first place, I do believe the great prosperity in the Northern States to-day and the development of the great Northwest is due to the immigration that came to this country before 1880. I call my friend's attention to the fact that the immigration that came here up to 1880 was of the Teutonic and Celtic people. It was immigration from northern Europe. They went out, as stated, into these western plains, cleared the land and developed farms, built railroads, and made markets for us, and in a large measure our prosperity is due to them; but the immigration coming to-day is not from northern Europe; it is from southern Europe; the same class of people that settled South America, as I explained a few moments ago. We do not want South American civilization in the Southern States. In place of that we want the Teutonic, and Celtic, and white civilization of the North. Now, if you would give us to-day the immigration from northern Europe, if you would give us the Irish, the English, the French, the German, the Scotch, and the Scandinavian, we will welcome him with both arms open, and are ready for him in the South and want him in the South.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. In that connection, Mr. Chairman, if it will not interrupt my colleague——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. As bearing on the demand for labor in the South, last year we made the largest cotton crop ever produced in the South—nearly fourteen million bales.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my colleague that I think there is a demand for labor in the South. I know in my district that we could use a good many more men in the furnaces, the mines, and the factories than we have got, and I would be glad to have them if we can get the right people, if we can get the kind of people that made the North and Northwest great—people of the Teutonic blood; but we do not want in the South an inferior race. We have one inferior race to contend with, and we do not want another that will give us a great deal more trouble.

Now, as to the production of cotton last year, I shall have to say to my colleague that I can not agree with him that it was labor that made that great crop. It was an unusual cotton season. It was the weather and the long-continued cotton season that made the 13,000,000 bales.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. In that connection, if my colleague will allow me to suggest, there is an explanation of that immense cotton crop. Take the statistics along in 1880 and you will find that 10 per cent of the cotton was produced at that time in the South by white labor. Take the statistics of last year and you will find that of that immense crop more than 50 per cent was made by white labor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure that is true.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. My friend behind me says 62 per cent of it last year was produced by white labor; and we contend that if they will let us alone we will solve the great problem of the negro by the white people coming into the South and cultivating the land.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no doubt my colleague's statement is true, and I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McNARY] that there is a demand among some of the southern farmers for more laborers; but it is from the large planters, the men who have four or five thousand acres of land under cultivation. The negroes of the South have gone to the North—have gone to railroad work; have gone to the furnaces; gone to the mines—and there is a scarcity of labor among the large planters. But you must remember that a great majority of the cotton farmers of the South are the men who follow the plow themselves. The great agitation among the farmers of the South is to cut down the amount of acreage, and to keep up the price of cotton thereby, and if you brought cheap Chinese labor or cheap European labor and put it on these big plantations, you would only increase the amount of the crop, pull down the price for the farmer who is following the plow himself, and make his condition worse than it is to-day.

Mr. McNARY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. There are one or two more thoughts I should like to ask the gentleman to consider before taking his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has only about two minutes remaining.

Mr. McNARY. He will hardly have time to consider these thoughts of mine, and perhaps I had better give expression to them myself a little later on; but I should like to ask him whether he does not know that it is the presence of the negro and the conditions under which the negro labors in the South that have kept the Irishman, the German, and the Scandinavian out of the South.

I should like to ask him also to explain to the House in what way the civilization of New Orleans and Louisiana, built up by the French, is inferior to the civilization of other white people.

I should like to ask him further to explain how it is that the countries of Argentina and Chile, occupied by Spanish-speaking people, with very few negroes or Indians, and lately receiving an immense immigration from Italy, are advancing as rapidly as the United States ever did in its history, so much so that Buenos Ayres, at the Paris Exposition, received a higher award for its educational work than did the city of Boston, the best educational center in the United States.

I think the gentleman is entirely wrong in his premises, and I hope to be able to convince this House at a little later stage that the Italian labor and the labor of southern Europe, instead of being a detriment, will be a benefit in every section of the country wherever it comes. Wherever they immigrate they buy property and improve it, and in my judgment they would prove to be buyers of property and improvers of waste land and would tend to develop waste territory and would prove to be builders-up rather than tearers-down of the civilization of the South. And later, if the committee does report a bill, I would like to submit some pertinent questions to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I can not in the two minutes remaining to me answer all of the gentleman's questions. I want to say, however, that there are many Italian laborers who come from the north of Italy who are of Celtic origin. They are of the white blood—a people of the same civilization and blood as ourselves. It is the immigrants of Iberic blood that do not come up to our standards.

Mr. McNARY. Is not the Spaniard of Celtic blood? Were not the great majority Celts and talking a Celtic tongue when the Romans conquered the country?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; the Spaniard is of Iberic blood.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCREARY of Pennsylvania). The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to answer the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but I can not go fully into an answer without taking some time. If the House will allow me a few minutes, I will endeavor to answer him briefly.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama have fifteen minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Alabama may be extended fifteen minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will not occupy the time of the House many minutes, because I have said very fully what I intended to say, but in answer to the remarks of my friend from Massachusetts I will say briefly that he referred me to the civilization of Chile and the Argentine. We know that Chile is the most powerful country in South America, the most progressive country in South America; that it has always been the most progressive country; that the civilization of Chile is more nearly equal to the civilization of America to-day than any other South American republic. I think my friend will agree with me as to that. Why is that the case? It only carries out and sustains the argument I have already made. Chile is the only South American country that has been more fully settled by the people of northern Europe—by the Celtic race and the Teutonic race of people—than any other country in South America. We know that although the people of Chile speak the Spanish tongue, to-day the leading men, the progressive men of that great southern country, came from the Scotch and Irish ancestry who went there one hundred years ago. It is the Scotch and Irish blood—the Celtic blood—in those people that has made Chile the great Republic of South America.

Mr. McNARY. Will the gentleman give me the names of a few of those Scotchmen?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not recall the names in an offhand speech.

Mr. McNARY. Is it the O'Higgins and the Lynches and the McKennas? [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, that would only carry out my argument, because they come from Ireland and are of the same Celtic blood. [Laughter.]

Now, as to the Italians. He says that there are instances in this country where the Italian labor has developed and done well. Well, that is true. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact: The report of the Commissioner of Immigration says that of the Italians that came to this country last year there were 185,000 from the south of Italy, or of the Iberic blood—that is, of the mixed blood. There are 35,000 who came from the north of Italy, of the Celtic blood—of the blood of our people.

Now, when you are speaking of Italians, you must designate where they come from, because the Italian from the north of Italy is of as good blood as we are, of the same blood, of unmixed blood; that same blood that made our civilization, and there are many settlements of Italians from northern Italy that are to-day doing as much good and advancing as rapidly in this country as any other class of immigrants, as those who come from Scandinavia, England, Scotland, Ireland, Germany, or France, because they have the same blood in them. As I have already said in this argument, the Creator of the universe made some men weak and some men strong; He made some men intelligent and some unintelligent; He created the great Celtic and Teutonic races to carry forward the banners of our present civilization and the principles of Christianity, and when we contaminate our blood with an inferior race we will not be carrying out the object of our creation, but will be tearing down the old-time American standards instead of building them up.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman to clearly define what he means by Iberic blood? May I ask him whether or not the race that produced the world's civilization anterior to the Romans, and in some respects the greatest race the world ever saw, were not the Greeks; whether or not Sicily and southern Italy were not Greek in origin; whether or not they did not talk the Greek tongue when the Romans extended their dominion over them, and whether or not they have not preserved the Greek characteristics? And in what way are the people of Greek blood inferior to those of northern Italy, other than because of the unfortunate conditions that surround them, other than the keeping up of the feudal system, the denial of opportunity, the absolute restriction of education—in what way are they inferior to the people of the other parts of Italy?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to encroach on the time of the House much further, but I shall be glad to answer the gentleman's questions, if I can. There is no question that the original Greek and the original Roman were of the same Aryan blood that we are, but, as I said, the people of Syria, Greece, Italy, Spain, and Portugal have for generations, yes, for hundreds of years, mixed their blood. They have absorbed emigrants from Asia and Africa; they have become amalgamated with the inferior races of Asia and Africa until to-day the Commissioner of Immigration and those who are learned in these matters designate these races of people from Spain and Portugal and Italy and Greece and Syria as of Iberic blood to distinguish them from the pure Celt and the pure Teuton—the men of the pure Aryan white race—and if the blood of the Iberic race is mixed and we try to assimilate it we mix our blood in the same way, possibly not to the same extent, that we would if we tried to bring to this country races from Asia or Africa and assimilate them.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Chairman, one more question, to get at this Iberic blood. Do I understand the gentleman would like to have the House understand that the Commissioner of Immigration, who, apparently, has invented a new race, would lead this House to believe that the Arab who invented and developed a civilization, many of the elements of which are among our choicest treasures at the present time, is not of Caucasian blood? That the Jew and the Syrian who developed a civilization of their own and have given to us many of the most precious things that we now have were not of Caucasian blood, and that the mixture therefore of Syrian and Arabic blood would be a mixture of elements non-Caucasian? What I desire to get at is this, whether or not that blood, the Aryan blood, a branch of the Caucasian race, is, in his judgment and the judgment of the Commissioner of Immigration, deteriorated to such a remarkable degree by mixture of the Semitic blood from the Arab and from the Syrian and from the Jew—other branches of the Caucasian race—that it produces an inferior race?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that I do not attempt to say what the Commissioner of Immigration believes. I merely state what the Commissioner says in his report and that he does designate the peoples of Portugal, Spain, southern Italy, Greece, and Syria as of the Iberic race, and as showing what the result would be I simply suggested, as an example, the difference between the civilization of the South American republics, that were settled and civilized by the people of the Iberic race, and the civilization of North America to-day, which is the civilization of the Celtic and Teutonic peoples.

Mr. BEDE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to my friend from Minnesota in a moment.

Mr. BEDE. I wish to ask one question, and that is, in your study of this subject, do you not think it would be better to put the burden upon the steamship companies who bring over these people, rather than upon the mere individual who comes here? Is it a crime not to have $25 upon reaching America? How many of the original settlers of Jamestown and Plymouth could have paid $25, as your colleague from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] would put in his bill? Is it not character rather than cash that we desire?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say I am not blaming any man for coming to America. I think he is a wise man who tries to come, but I think we ought to protect ourselves. I suggest that when each immigrant is charged a head tax of $25 and can not pay it the steamship company which brings him over without it ought to be made to carry him back free. I do not believe in putting any hardship upon the poor immigrant. We can not pass a law designating from what European countries we will admit emigrants and which we will not, therefore we must adopt a plan that will only admit the strongest and the best, and a head tax is part of that plan.

Mr. BEDE. Had we not better put them under civil service? [Laughter.] Would not a head tax make the immigrant merely the slave of the man who advanced the $25?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; because our laws prohibit anyone from paying it for the immigrant; he must earn it in advance for himself.

Mr. BEDE. I know, but it is done just the same.

Mr. WHARTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. WHARTON. Does the gentleman from Alabama think and has he ever considered, or has he made an investigation and does he not now think, that along this line of labor and for the purpose of securing the proper amount of labor in the southern industries, not confined to any one Congressional district, but to the whole South—the new South and the industries there—if the same rate of wages prevailed there as does in the Northern States you could fill up the whole South and the industries there with enough of this good Irish labor, which can be procured in the North and which is the best kind of labor on the face of the earth, to meet your demands?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that he is assuming a fact which is not so. He is assuming the wages of the South are not as good as those of the North. I represent a large manufacturing industrial district in the South, and I will say that our wages—that is, the mills and factories—are governed by the amalgamated scale. The labor scale that governs your wages is identically the same as that which governs ours, and the wages paid to our miners are greater than they are paid to your miners, because your coal miners, if you are referring to them, are paid by the long ton and are only paid for the coal that goes from the screen; they get nothing for the slack coal. It is only the lump coal for which they are paid. Our miners are paid by the short ton and are paid for all the coal that comes out of the mine; therefore if the gentleman makes a fair comparison of miners' wages he will see the miner of Alabama is paid more per ton for his work than the miner in Pennsylvania. So my friend is making a mistake when he assumes that there is cheap labor in the South. I will tell you what keeps the class of immigrants that we would like to have from coming South: It is that they have to come in contact with the negro, and they do not wish to do so. That is our unfortunate position. We will be glad to welcome them there.

Mr. Chairman, let us hope that at an early date the committee having this important matter in charge will report a bill to the House so restricting immigration to our country as to protect the American wage-earner, whether on the farm, in the furnace, the mines, or the factory, against the pauper labor that is now threatening his family and his home. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the article I send to the Clerk's desk be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

RESPONSIBILITY FOR HAZING.

When the facts of the Branch-Meriweather tragedy first transpired, the Post was at no loss to identify it as the fruit—and the perfectly legitimate fruit—of a survival of hazing. It stood unmistakably revealed in that sinister light, and we so described it in our editorial comment at the time. Meriwether had been hazed—they call it "running" now, but it is the same old abominable persecution in another name—and Meriwether, instead of submitting to the outrage, forced a fight upon his tormentor.

Now, it appears that hazing or running—label the barbarism as you will—has been going on steadily, and not so very secretly at that. Young Meriwether told no tales. He took his own case in hand, and managed it as best he could for his dignity and self-respect. It was plain enough that he had no protection save in his own courage and his own strong arm. Anyone could see that he had to fight or incur the contempt and ostracism of the whole academy.

Whose fault was it? Whose fault is it now with this hazing and little boys sent to the hospital every few days? When Willard Brownson was Superintendent at Annapolis he executed the law and expelled three hazers, as was his bounden duty. Then came Congress repudiating its own laws and reinstated those three offenders. They had a pleasant holiday, lost nothing in grade, escaped a little unpleasant service, and are at present, on the whole, distinctly beneficiaries of the episode. Congress is making a great uproar over these recent disclosures of hazing and general ruffianism, but what could Congress have expected after reinstating the hazers expelled by Admiral Brownson and thus sealing their offenses with approval? Is it now proposed to hold Admiral Sands responsible for conditions which Congress itself has deliberately created?

Meanwhile, as the perfectly natural product of all this hypocritical nonsense, we are developing at Annapolis every latent instinct of cowardice and hoodlumism. It is all very fine for Congress to get up on its hind legs and snort at the spectacle now presented for its inspection. All the same, the fault lies at the Government's door, and nowhere else.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I call that rather a drastic article on the situation and especially with reference to what is said about the Congress of the United States, but while it is hard and severe, can any Member of this House challenge the correctness of the statement? A few years ago a young man in the Military Academy was hazed to death, a constituent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER]. Congress was wrought up over that death, as it should have been, and a committee of investigation was appointed which investigated and made its report, and proper legislation followed the recommendation of that committee. The matter certainly was made as public as anything of the kind could be. The investigations of that committee were published from day to day in the press of the country. The discussions upon the floor of this House were published, but when three young men, in defiance of the laws of the United States and in defiance of the rules and regulations and discipline of the Naval Academy, proceeded deliberately to violate that law and were tried and expelled by the officers of the Naval Academy, as it was their sworn duty to do, what followed?

Because they were three fine specimens of American manhood, and because they had three eloquent gentlemen on the floor of this House to plead for them, a bill was introduced that authorized their reappointment into the Navy. It could not be construed in any other light by those men than to be at least a forgiveness for what they had done and a weakening on the part of Congress in the enforcement of the law. When that bill was brought up in the House repeatedly and unanimous consent was asked for its consideration, some Member of the House invariably objected. And on the 4th day of February, 1905, the bill was brought up, and I will read from the RECORD to show what took place at that time:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWN] again asks unanimous consent for present consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A bill (H. R. 17750) authorizing the appointment of certain midshipmen to the United States Navy."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I shall object until I understand this bill better. We passed a bill to prevent this offense, and here we are going to work to rescind that action at the first instance of its violation. The President himself says that it was a plain violation of the law, though not an aggravated one. Now, we will have six suspension days at the end of this Congress, when the House can pass the bill, if it is disposed to do so. I voted for the measure to prevent hazing, and here upon the very first occasion where it has been violated we are asked to vacate action under it. I have no feeling in this matter myself, and do not know any of these young men.

The suspension days came, and we know how suspension measures get through the House. They come right on the heels of Congress, when every Member is interested in getting some other measure through in that way or by unanimous consent. He fails to vote against the measure for fear that some measure in which he is interested will be refused unanimous consent or voted against. That measure was passed in this House, I believe, not as a result of the deliberate judgment of the House, but by reason of the coercion growing out of the circumstances. It is unpleasant to say "I told you so," but it was talked privately here and urged upon the part of Members not to object until it almost became a menace as well as a species of persuasion. So the bill was passed.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] yield for just a suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. PRINCE. I think the gentleman from Tennessee and myself agreed upon that proposition, and both of us spoke in opposition to it.

Mr. SIMS. We certainly did.

Mr. PRINCE. In order to remind the gentleman, I wish to call his attention to this, that the President of the United States, who is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, on January 11 sent a special message to Congress. Does the gentleman recollect that?

Mr. SIMS. I do.

Mr. PRINCE. I will just hand you this paper.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman can read it while he has it there.

Mr. PRINCE. The gentleman from Tennessee can use it himself. I wanted to call his attention to the fact that the President asked it be done.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Illinois is entirely correct. The President of the United States did ask that he be authorized to reappoint the young men. The President himself is subject to the same influence that we are. No doubt the almost irresistible gentlemen who appealed to Members of this House in private conversation to not vote against these young men also brought pressure to bear upon the President of the United States, and he, through the same feeling, committed the same mistake that we did.

Mr. RIXEY. I understand that the gentleman from Tennessee referred in the first part of his remarks to a young man who lost his life as a result of hazing at the academy?

Mr. SIMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RIXEY. And to argue that this law against hazing was a result of that case? Now, if that is true, hazing then was then supposed to be an aggravated offense, something from which would necessarily follow physical disability or injury?

Mr. SIMS. Possibly.

Mr. RIXEY. Will the gentleman tell me if he knows what were the circumstances in regard to the three cadets?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not recall the circumstances in regard to the three cadets who were expelled, but the President in his message says it was a plain violation of the law.

Mr. RIXEY. Now, will the gentleman allow me to inform him to some extent as to what the circumstances were? In that case there was practically no physical hurt. There may not have been any other kind of injury to these three cadets. One of them, as I remember the circumstances, had failed to promptly respond when ordered to line or dress up by his superior officer. The superior officer said, "Come to my room to-night." That evening he came around. The superior officer was not in, but his roommate was, and he asked him what he wanted. The cadet said, "I have come here because I am ordered by my superior officer." He said, "I suppose he wants to put you through some of the ordinary exercises." I had forgotten the names of them, but they were ordinary gymnastic exercises such as are practiced at the academy. That was the offense in one case. When the witnesses were before the naval committee, one of them, and I think it was Captain Brownson, in reply to a question from me as to what was hazing—because the statute does not define it—said, "It is any command by a superior classman to a lower classman."

For instance, he said: "If a superior class man directed one of the other class men to 'bring him a glass of water,' and he obeyed, that," he said, "is hazing." Now, I wish to ask the gentleman this: Ought there not to be some degrees in hazing?

Mr. SIMS. Of course I will be glad to answer the gentleman. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia who has just interrogated me if he was not one of the members of that committee?

Mr. RIXEY. I was, and heard all the testimony.

Mr. SIMS. And therefore as a Member who determined with reference to this particular case, I take it that he did know, and that he voted in favor of it?

Mr. RIXEY. I did, and made some remarks on the floor in favor of the action which was taken.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman also voted for the law which was passed on the subject?

Mr. RIXEY. I do not know when that law was passed. I presume I voted for the law if it came up during my term of service here.

Mr. SIMS. The young gentlemen who had been expelled violated the law which this House passed.

Mr. RIXEY. The court-martial which tried them decided that they had violated the law, but the law which was passed by Congress contained no definition of hazing. These young men were dismissed from the academy for doing what I think was a very minor offense. I think it was a gross injustice to the young men that they should be dismissed from the academy, and not be allowed to hold office under the Government of the United States again. Congress has righted the wrong that was done by inflicting the minor punishment of reduction in rank.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman now returns to the argument that he favored at first; I take it that he takes that position in all good faith. But it certainly occurs to me as the experience of my life that the first offense committed is usually the least, and if you begin forgiving and overlooking the first offense it simply leads to graver offenses. I have no doubt that the gentleman from Virginia and members of the committee who reported that bill were animated by humane motives and goodness of heart, but the whole country believes that by reason of the action of this House it has brought upon itself the shed blood of Midshipman Branch.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee if the evidence in the Meriwether case does not disclose the fact that this hazing and these contests have been going on there for several years, and if that had not been the custom long prior to the time that Congress passed this act reinstating these young men? If that is the case, why is Congress to be criticised and held responsible for the action that the newspaper referred to charges?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the newspaper article I read charges—and it is a conservative paper, the Washington Post, which is not given to yellow journalism or sensationalism, but reechoes the press of the entire country—that when the officers of the Naval Academy, in pursuance of the law, had done their duty Congress wiped out the result of their action by restoring to their rank in the Navy these first offenders against the law.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Does not the evidence in the Meriwether case show that the law had been violated constantly prior to the time that Congress passed this act reinstating these young men?

Mr. SIMS. Why, Mr. Chairman, the very fact that this practice existed was the cause of the enactment of the law.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Yes; and all the faculty there in charge of that naval institution knew that this law was being violated constantly, and if they did know they should have come in and made objection when this bill was pending in Congress.

Mr. SIMS. Let me say in reply to the gentleman, in the case of the hazing of Mr. Kimbrough, of Tennessee, which took place only a few days ago, and since the death of Branch, and since the trial of Meriwether began, Kimbrough was threatened with death if he reported the guilty parties.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. You do not answer my question.

Mr. SIMS. I am going to answer it.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, if these young men were guilty of this inhuman, brutal, and cowardly conduct, and then threatened to kill their victim if he reported them, do you suppose it does not have some effect upon the officers of that institution, after having discharged their duty, that Congress by its action nullifies their action?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I want to say to the gentleman that I supported that measure under the representation and belief that the young men had been guilty of nothing more than at least a technical violation of this law, that they had not violated the spirit of the law at all, and that there was no objection really on the part of the faculty to their reinstatement. But it was with the full understanding and belief that the offense of hazing was not practiced in that institution. If I had known the facts disclosed since, I would never have voted to reinstate those young men. But nevertheless I think the faculty of that institution should have communicated to Congress what knowledge they had, if they were going to hold Congress responsible for refusing to enforce the law as we had made it.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman certainly did not read the report of the Secretary of the Navy. The officer in charge of the Naval Academy said the act would have a bad effect upon the institution and a bad effect upon the discipline, and, while they did not use the exact language, the meaning was that it would bring the law into disrepute and render it null and void, just as it has done.

Mr. MUDD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MUDD. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to correct what I think is a misapprehension in his mind.

Mr. SIMS. I should be glad to have any misapprehension corrected.

Mr. MUDD. The gentleman states that these young men were reinstated in the academy.

Mr. SIMS. Reappointed, I said.

Mr. MUDD. They were not in fact reappointed to the academy, but reinstated in the Navy.

Mr. SIMS. Reappointed in the Navy.

Mr. MUDD. I do not say that for the purpose of controversy, but simply to correct a misapprehension. The gentleman states that all punishment was wiped out. The gentleman is mistaken in that. In the intervening time they had suffered considerable punishment, and they suffered the punishment of a very large reduction of rank, for they were put back at the very foot of the class in which they had formerly had held quite high rank.

One other thing. The Superintendent of the academy, if I recollect aright, said it would be very hurtful to discipline if these young men were allowed to come back to the academy, where their unlawful practices had been carried on. As a matter of fact, as I have already stated, they were not allowed to come back to the academy.

Mr. SIMS. They were pardoned by act of Congress. Whether all the discomforts that they had suffered by reason of their misdeeds and violation of law were wiped out or not is not the question. Whether they were reappointed to the academy or not is not the question. They were reappointed to positions in the Navy. They were not degraded.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. SIMS. I am glad to yield, although it looks as though my speech would be all questions and no answers.

Mr. LOUD. Just one question.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. LOUD. Are you aware that there were twenty fist fights at the academy between the time that these men were expelled and the time when they were reinstated in the Navy, previous to the time mentioned in this article?

Mr. SIMS. I was not aware of it. I assume from the gentleman's question that he means to assert that that is true—that there were twenty fist fights.

Mr. LOUD. I mean to say that when the investigation takes place which we have asked for those facts will come out.

Mr. SIMS. You charge that there were twenty fist fights?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I do not know myself whether there were or not, but I accept the gentleman's statement that there were. And what a comment it is upon the Naval Academy of the United States that we are being taxed here to keep young men there to practice fist fights. [Applause.]

Mr. LOUD. And, more than that, fagging, which is just another method of hazing, has been in full swing all this time, which fact now comes to our knowledge and will come out in the investigation.

Mr. SIMS. In other words, the law we passed has been held in utter contempt by the young men of that institution.

Mr. LOUD. Precisely, before the time you speak of.

Mr. SIMS. Before and since.

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. And it seems to me, if this be true, that it must have been with the connivance of the officers.

Mr. LOUD. Exactly.

Mr. SIMS. I do not make that charge on my own personal knowledge, for I do not know; but, Mr. Chairman, there is a resolution introduced at the other end of this Capitol and one introduced in this House to investigate. I am in favor of both resolutions; and when these deplorable and disgraceful facts are brought out in the heat of our indignation we pass salutary laws, and when an attempt is made to enforce them we turn around, childlike, in the spirit of kindness, and wipe out all we have done by pardoning the offenders.

Now, if the naval officers in charge of that academy are to be censured, let us censure them. But are we not rather estopped, at least those of us who voted for that reinstatement measure, for these officers at the time stated plainly what would be the effect upon the discipline of the academy. They said it would not help it, and it did not help it. But, are the officers in charge of that institution simply there to draw salaries and shut their eyes to these enormities, and neither report them or act upon them? If they are, the sooner we remove them the better. These young men from the several Congressional districts of this country are sent there to receive their education in order that they may ornament the Navy and be useful to their country; but if they are to receive the education only of prize fighters and bullies, the sooner we stop the appropriation the better it will be. [Applause.]

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee who appointed Mr. Kimbrough is not here to speak for himself, or I would not have arisen on this occasion. What do we hear from the press of Tennessee to-day? That the parents of that young man who was hazed, and who would have died if he had not had medical attention, want him to resign and come home. I do not believe, and I shall not believe until I see the proof, that a majority of the cadets are of the brutal type that the proof shows that some of them are. It is the bad minority, and some of the others seem to have a fear of reporting it. Why, who would not be afraid when death is to be measured out to the student who reports these misdeeds? Somebody has asked what is hazing? I do not care what hazing is, but I know what assault and battery and manslaughter and murder is.

A MEMBER. That is hazing. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Is there a city or town in the United States that permits such conduct to go on as is going on at our Naval Academy and at West Point and called "hazing?" Would municipal or State authorities permit it among those under their immediate charge and not place them in jail or the penitentiary, where they belong? I think you can not find a community anywhere in which the young men go about beating and bullying and killing other young men. But that is what is going on at these academies. It is very difficult to find it out, and it is only when death comes as a shock to the whole community. You may talk about twenty fist fights—there may have been 120, and probably there were. Nothing but a death that shocks the whole community brings it to the country's attention, and then we find out the facts. Think of it! Millions have been spent for magnificent buildings, officers detailed under good salaries, and young gentlemen sent there from all parts of the United States to learn what? The rules and practices of the prize ring—upper cuts, solar plexus, stomach punching. How can any man who has a heart feel proud of a record made by a young man that goes there and learns such things as that? Show me a commanding officer, a great general, or admiral in the world's history that was not a kind and humane man. Show me one that ever, because he had it in his power, put to pain a weaker mortal simply for the sake of brutal inhuman pleasure that he might get out of seeing the weak one suffer. But that is the record this academy is making.

We can not be too severe in the denunciation of it or in speaking of the fact. The facts are bad enough, and I have no doubt that we have not got all of them. But I hope that we shall have them, and then after deliberation, if the House passes additional legislation, after thorough investigation and report, I hope we shall have the hardihood to stand up and sustain our action, and not reverse the action of the officers of the academy when they have carried out, or attempted to carry out, the law that we have made.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania). Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Did the gentleman observe in the press that the officers of the academy state that the reason that the hazing took place is that Congress passed a law two years ago relieving the two young men from the sentence that had been imposed?

Mr. SIMS. I have noticed in the newspapers that the officers say that our action here is the occasion of the recent hazing.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is their defense for the recent hazing.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; that is the defense made by the officers, that Congress itself has restored the young men to the academy.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman whether he remembers that the President of the United States sent a message to Congress upon that subject? I would like to have the gentleman put it in the RECORD in connection with his remarks, so that the facts may be fully set forth and the responsibility of Congress concerning the matter.

Mr. SIMS. Yes, I will include the message. I do not know how long the report is, but will include it if not too long, or the letter of the Secretary of the Navy. Mr. Chairman, in order that the House may have the defense—those who voted for that—of the President's message, I shall include it in my remarks. It is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In the fall of 1903 John Henry Lofland, Earl Worden Chaffee, and Joseph Drummond Little, then members of the first or highest class at the Naval Academy, severally committed acts for which they were charged with the offense of hazing, were tried by court-martial, and were dismissed from the academy and from the naval service.

In a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House, March 21, 1904, the Secretary of the Navy, after reviewing the facts upon which action in the cases of these midshipmen was based, states that "if discretion in the infliction of punishment had been vested either in the court-martial or the Department a lighter punishment than dismissal from the service might have been inflicted," and concludes that Congress is the proper authority to determine in cases of this character whether exception should be made to the operation of the statute.

The Committee on Naval Affairs (House Report No. 2454, 58th Cong., 2d sess.), upon consideration of the Department's report, unanimously concludes that "under all the circumstances no detriment will be done the service" by sanctioning the appointment of these midshipmen to the naval service under appropriate conditions and restrictions.

Upon review of the facts in this case, I concur generally in the conclusions of the Secretary of the Navy and the Committee on Naval Affairs with respect to the character of the offenses committed by these midshipmen. Their acts were in plain violation of the letter of the statute, but the case presented is not an aggravated one, and I believe that their severance from the academy, their reduction to the foot of the class of which they were members, and their entry into the naval service without formal graduation will be adequate punishment.

The draft of a bill granting authority for the appointment of these midshipmen to the Navy under conditions and restrictions believed to be sufficient to guard the interests of the service is inclosed for the consideration of the Congress.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 11, 1905.

I take the following from the report:

[H. R. 12273, granting President authority to restore certain midshipmen to service.]

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 21, 1904.

SIR: The receipt is acknowledged of your letter of the 29th ultimo, with which you inclosed, with request for the views and recommendations of the Department thereupon, the bill (H. R. 12273) granting authority to the President, in his discretion, to restore certain midshipmen to the naval service.

In reply I have the honor to state that the midshipmen referred to in this bill are John Henry Lofland, Earl Worden Chaffee, and Joseph Drummond Little, all members of the first or highest class at the academy. The class left the academy in February, 1904, for the purpose of completing their academic course at sea. In October, 1903, these midshipmen severally committed acts for which they were charged with the offense of hazing, tried by court-martial, and sentenced to dismissal from the service. The sentences were approved by the Superintendent of the academy and were duly carried into effect.

I have examined with care the evidence in each case, and find no substantial differences in the facts. In each case the accused selected a midshipman of the lowest class who had been guilty of some minor irregularity, such as taking fruit from the mess room, being surly or disobedient in the ranks, and the like, ordered him to the room of the accused, and there directed him to repeat in each case one or more of certain exercises as a punishment for his misconduct. The exercise may be described as follows: The "sixteenth exercise," where, while standing erect, one bends the knees until the thighs touch the heels and rapidly rises again; standing upon the head; "doing the cruise," where one lies on the back and raises one leg to a position perpendicular to the body, lowering slowly until within 1 inch of the floor and raising it again to the same position; hanging upon the wardrobe by the hands. These exercises were repeated very many times. No injury was incurred, except that the muscles of the leg were somewhat stiff the next day. The exercises which were performed were legitimate gymnastic exercises not unusual at the academy. They were performed under compulsion and for the purpose of inflicting punishment. There was no right on the part of the accused to inflict any punishment whatever for a violation of discipline, as punishment can be inflicted only by order of the Superintendent. Each of the accused was an officer in the corps of midshipmen, and it was his duty to take notice of breaches of discipline and report them, instead of inflicting punishment for them.

From this statement of the cases it will be seen that if discretion in the infliction of punishment had been vested either in the court-martial or the Department, a lighter punishment than dismissal from the service might have been inflicted; but this can not be said with certainty, in view of the great importance which has been attached to the total eradication of the practice of hazing. There was, however, under the law, no discretion as to punishment. The act of June 23, 1874, is as follows:

"In all cases when it shall come to the knowledge of the Superintendent of the Naval Academy at Annapolis that any naval cadet has been guilty of the offense commonly known as hazing, it shall be the duty of the Superintendent to order a court-martial, composed of not less than three commissioned officers, who shall minutely examine into all the facts and circumstances of the case and make a finding thereon; and any naval cadet found guilty of said offense by said court shall, upon recommendation of said court, be dismissed; and such finding, when approved by said Superintendent, shall be final, and the cadet so dismissed from said Naval Academy shall be forever ineligible to reappointment to said Naval Academy."

The act of March 3, 1903, is as follows:

"That the Superintendent of the Naval Academy shall make such rules, to be approved by the Secretary of the Navy, as will effectually prevent the practice of hazing; and any cadet found guilty of participating in or encouraging or countenancing such practice shall be summarily expelled from the academy, and shall not thereafter be reappointed to the corps of cadets or be eligible for appointment as a commissioned officer in the Army or Navy or Marine Corps until two years after the graduation of the class of which he was a member.

It will be observed that the first act renders the offender forever ineligible for reappointment to the academy. The second act, in addition, renders the offender ineligible for appointment as a commissioned officer in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps until two years after the graduation of the class of which he was a member. The class from which these midshipmen were dismissed will be finally graduated in 1906, the course of instruction being by law six years, part of which is spent at sea. Under the law, therefore, the persons dismissed are not eligible for appointment as commissioned officers until the year 1908.

I feel that I should be lacking in my duty to Congress if I did not present the views of the officers responsible for the administration of the Naval Academy, who have loyally endeavored to obey the will of Congress as expressed in the law. Upon certain bills contemplating the restoration of the offenders to the Naval Academy the Superintendent of the Naval Academy and the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation expressed the view that their restoration to the Naval Academy "will be a serious blow at its discipline, and will simply invite another outbreak of hazing, which has now been stopped at the academy. To reinstate them would probably necessitate the dismissal of others within the coming year." The bill under discussion, however, does not propose to reinstate the offenders to the Naval Academy, but authorizes the President to appoint them to the naval service, to rank below the other members of their class. They would thus reenter the Navy without completing the academic course at Annapolis, but with a reduction in rank which would constitute a continuing punishment throughout their future service. Even upon this bill, however, it is pointed out by the commandant of cadets who, in the absence of the Superintendent, at the Department's request has expressed his views thereon, that "the effect upon the discipline of this school of restoring these midshipmen to the service in any capacity until two years after the graduation of the class of which they were members will * * * be bad."

Upon the foregoing statement of facts it is believed that the committee will be able to reach a conclusion respecting the question presented. The Department considers that its duty in cases of this character is to obey the law as it stands, and that Congress is the proper authority to determine whether, in any given cases, exceptions should be made to the operation of statute.

Very respectfully,

W. H. MOODY, Secretary.

Hon. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives.

I am not here censuring any man as having improper motives. They voted as they did because it was presented to them in the way of a kindness, as a species of forgiveness, and as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] said, that they had been guilty of like offenses. But what are you going to do? Suppose you have another bill presented here. We have already got a good law if it is only enforced. Here are three men who were convicted on the same law who are now in the Navy. Here are others guilty of like offenses, maybe more aggravated, who will be expelled, or ought to be. Then, you will find that we have established a precedent for putting them back, provided they can show that they were acting from long-standing habit. Do numerous repetitions on this thing make it right or a pardonable wrong?

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee says that he knows what assault and battery and what beatings and murder are.

Mr. SIMS. I said manslaughter.

Mr. RIXEY. Manslaughter. I desire to suggest to him that the case of the three cadets was neither one of these. If that is what he means by hazing, then the three cadets were not guilty of hazing. The cadets were not only heard in testimony, but Captain Brownson and the other officers at the Naval Academy were also heard, and it was thoroughly sifted. It was shown to be neither assault and battery, beating, nor manslaughter. It was simply requiring the cadets to do some of the exercises that they were accustomed to under their superior officers.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Standing on their heads?

Mr. RIXEY. I do not think that was in it. No; my colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] says it was not. One of them was holding oneself up by the arms in this fashion and bringing the body up a number of times. Another was the "setting-up" drill. I want to ask my friend this, If he does not think there ought to be a difference between the punishment of people who are not guilty of serious offenses and those who are guilty of serious offenses? And I want to say, furthermore, that instead of my friend saying, as he can very readily now, "I told you so"—and nearly every gentleman in this House who voted against the three-cadet bill now comes up and says "I told you so"—instead of leveling his remarks against the Congress why does he not level his remarks against the authorities at Annapolis? [Applause.] According to the recent testimony in the Meriwether case, they evidently winked at and had knowledge of the fact that the rules were continually being violated.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have said before that I was not acquainted with the details of the violation of the law by the three cadets mentioned.

You have heard read the plea the President made, and now the officers of the academy say that law was the cause of hazing being recommenced or pursued in the academy.

Mr. RIXEY. And it looks as if the officers of the academy were to blame.

Mr. SIMS. The officers say that Congress was to blame.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does that make it so?

Mr. SIMS. And the newspapers of the entire country say that Congress was to blame, and I am trying to call the attention of the House to the fact of how useless it will be to have a new investigation and another law or an amendment of an existing law if we are going, through sympathy or otherwise, to abrogate the law or its penalties after they have been inflicted in the future.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Do I understand the gentleman to state that the law, as it now stands, is sufficient to prevent hazing if properly enforced?

Mr. SIMS. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is amazing to think that at these two great institutions, kept up by the Government—by the taxes of the people—that they will be guilty of such brutal, inhuman, and barbarous conduct as the evidence shows they have without any law except self-respect and the environment of a Christian neighborhood.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I understand the gentleman to say that the law, as it now stands, is sufficient, if properly enforced, to prevent hazing.

Mr. SIMS. I do not want it to be understood that I am not in favor of making this law stronger.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Is the law adequate, as it now stands, if properly enforced?

Mr. SIMS. I think it is, or would have proven so if Members of Congress had only had the nerve to stand by the law which they passed themselves.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Well, I will ask the gentleman another question. Does he not think it would be proper and right that there should be a full investigation by Congress to see why this law has not been enforced and who is responsible for its not being enforced?

Mr. SIMS. I certainly do. As I said before, if you can not enforce the laws we have with the officers you have there now, what is the use of giving them more laws?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. In one moment. Now, if we have an academy here filled by a lot of young men who, instead of being an honor to their country, are studying prize-ring rules and seeking more the reputation of a bully than a hero [applause], the sooner we keep them at home the better. Wipe out the appropriation and stop the crimes. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I fully agree with the gentleman, and I think this ought to be stopped; but inasmuch as it seems the responsibility is being placed upon Congress by the faculty of that institution for the violation of law, as he has stated, I think it is incumbent upon Congress to investigate the condition of affairs down there and see who is responsible.

Mr. SIMS. I think you are exactly right, and I will vote for it.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. And I believe that the failure on the part of Congress to take due notice of this would have a demoralizing influence, not only on Annapolis and West Point, but upon every college in the country.

Mr. SIMS. I think you are exactly right, and I approve of every word you have said.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have just come in, and I have not heard all the gentleman from Tennessee has said, but he has referred to a statute there, and I presume he has it before him, which is applicable to these cases. Now, will you please read the statute for the information of the House, and I think this will be a good time to do so, and let us see whether it needs strengthening or not.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have not the statute.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman from Virginia has the statute.

Mr. SIMS. Then I will be glad to read it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will ask you to read that part which is marked.

Mr. SIMS. It reads as follows:

Provided further, That the Superintendent of the Military Academy shall make such rules, to be approved by the Secretary of War, as will effectually prevent the practice of hazing; and any cadet found guilty of participating in, or encouraging or countenancing such practice shall be summarily expelled from the academy and shall not thereafter be reappointed to the Corps of Cadets, or be eligible to appointment as a commissioned officer of the Army or Navy or Marine Corps until two years after the graduation of the class of which he was a member.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, I will ask the gentleman if he does not think, instead of remanding that question to the superintendents of the academies, would it not be better for Congress to pass some criminal statute applicable to such cases, defining hazing and assault and battery, aggravated assault, manslaughter, and murder, and then make it applicable to those two institutions, and not leave it to the superintendents and commandants, who, I believe, are winking at this offense daily and weekly there?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I heartily approve of the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I would also make it applicable to them as coconspirators when they wink at it. I believe they are winking at it, and I believe there ought to be a further investigation and this statute ought to be so amended.

Mr. BOWIE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. BOWIE. The gentleman from Tennessee believes that pardons are sometimes properly granted?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, yes, indeed.

Mr. BOWIE. That the pardoning power ought to rest with some officer for an offense. That being true, would the gentleman contend that because the governor of a State, or pardoning power, recommended a pardon in a particular case, that therefore they were responsible for all murders committed thereafter?

Mr. SIMS. I certainly would not think so and I do not think the gentleman from Alabama was very serious in his question. The President, as I am informed, could have restored these young men without act of Congress——

Mr. BOWIE. Evidently not, because he recommended the passage of this bill, and they are trying to put upon us the responsibility for the commission of crimes since then merely because we thought in three cases there was just cause for the pardon or mitigation of the penalty existing, which I do not think justifies their subsequent conduct in the slightest degree, any more than the pardon of a man charged with murder would justify the commission of murder afterwards.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that this is on all fours with the suggestion of the gentleman. The officers in charge of the Naval Academy are responsible for its discipline and its government, and when they make rules in accordance with what the law authorizes and we set aside the result of their disciplinary measures, it has the effect to break down the discipline in the institution thereafter. While you might be perfectly willing to pardon a young man who had been guilty as they were in this case, if it results in a reinstatement of the conditions that existed before, which seems to be the fact if the officials of the Naval Academy are to be believed, the result is greater than usually attaches to the pardon of an individual. It is the wiping out of the good effects of law. Every time a good rule is violated and its violation is condoned, you weaken the rule. And that is what has been done in the present case.

Now, I am certainly in favor of all legislation that is necessary to prevent a recurrence of the conduct of which these gentlemen have been guilty, however severe it may be, to bring about that result, even if it goes to the extent of wiping out the academy entirely. I am not willing to vote appropriations here to educate young men in a charity school to compete with Corbett, Fitzsimmons, and Jeffries in the learning of the prize ring. I will vote willingly to wipe out the whole thing if it can not be run as a Christian nation ought to run it. [Applause.] Who wants to see a battle ship in charge of an admiral who in his schoolboy days took pleasure in the suffering of a helpless, innocent victim, simply being tortured, that he might enjoy the brutishness of a nature that even excels that of the lower animals. Where in nature do you find an animal among the lower animals or beasts that ever yet punished or tortured one of their own kind simply to enjoy the spectacle of the suffering growing out of it?

Talk about defining hazing! I do not care what hazing is. The things that have been done in its name can never be conducive to the building up of a noble character and fit those guilty of it for the high positions for which they are intended.

Mr. WACHTER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. SIMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WACHTER. Would not the gentleman include football in that as well?

Mr. SIMS. I am not so well up on football.

Mr. WACHTER. Has the gentleman ever seen a game?

Mr. SIMS. I saw one game, and that was enough for me.

Mr. WACHTER. Well, the gentleman should include that in his remarks.

Mr. SIMS. Let me draw the distinction. I never yet knew a long-haired gentleman who was forced into a football team because the other fellows were larger than he was. He voluntarily goes into it, turns his hair loose and makes a rush at another man whose hair is loose. [Laughter.] It is all voluntary; there is no coercion. And besides, the Government of the United States does not pay for the education of a football bully.

Mr. WACHTER. But the Government pays for the man if he is maimed to such an extent as to be sent away from the academy?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Maryland did not state that he meant football at the academy. Mr. Chairman, if we stop murder and manslaughter maybe we will get down to where we can stop the brutalities of football. But in such a contest they are at least selected with reference to their equality. They do not take only the students of the upper class. I think if you were to rake down to the mudsills of society you would find a class higher than such a class. [Applause.] The members of the upper class are several years older. They have gone through what is necessary to harden their muscles, and they make a practice of taking a little boy who has just been appointed, a boy who is the pride of his parents and the hope of the community, and compel him to stand on his head, in order to please these gentlemen of the upper class, until he is almost dead. That is the information that I have with reference to Mr. Kimbrough, of Tennessee.

Mr. MAHON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMS. I do.

Mr. MAHON. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Where these cadets engage in a brutal fist fight, whether the cadets engaged in it and the referee, in case a cadet is killed, do not deserve suspension and discharge from the academy as well as the cadets who simply stand a boy on his head and make him unconscious for a half hour or so?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the question is well put and well asked. Where in any State of this Union could you go on and hold a prize fight in which manslaughter follows that every party to the fight would not be regarded as guilty and as a principal? I think the same punishment should be administered to those who violate the laws of the land and State in the naval and military academies that would be meted out to men in a town of a State for such an offense.

Mr. MAHON. Would not the effect of the code be that it would not be murder, but where a cadet goes voluntarily into a fight and the cadet is killed, the offense would be that of manslaughter?

Mr. SIMS. I know that it is manslaughter, but there is in a sense premeditation. The fight is prearranged and is according to a programme. There is at least that much premeditation. The killing was no doubt not intended; but any killing in violation of law is manslaughter. I say, are we going to continue appropriating money to keep up a great institution that ought to be the pride of the people, that permits such conduct as has been brought to the knowledge of every one in this House in the last few weeks?

Mr. MAHON. Does not the gentleman believe that the trouble about these academies is not so much in the boys as it is in the officers of the Navy and the Army [loud applause], and that in order to get at the root of the whole evil we will have to strike at the men in command who do not discourage this condition of affairs, as appears to be the case with the officers of the Navy and of the Army?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I must be candid. I have nobody to shield. I believe that if the officers used that degree of diligence which they should and which they are there to use, they might not possibly prevent every offense, but certainly we would have much less of it than we have been having. I do not wish to shield them.

Mr. MAHON. Is it not a fact that Mr. Bronson, the Superintendent of the academy, recommended or said to the Naval Committee and through the Naval Academy to Congress, that they had no objection to having them reinstated, and if they were it would not interfere with the discipline of the academy?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know. I was not present, and I did not hear the testimony, but I have read a report in the newspapers as coming from the Secretary of the Navy, in which the officers stated that it would have a bad effect on discipline.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I stated some time ago in the discussion I understood that the officials at the naval school made no objection or protest. I did it by reason of the fact that a member of the Naval Committee stated to me that they would make no objection to the reinstatement of these men. They were helpless and they had to go into the case and endeavor to secure proper administration, but that they would make no objection to the reinstatement.

Mr. SULZER. Who is the member?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I do not care to give the name; I talked to him in private.

Mr. SIMS. This is all a closed incident so far as the people of this country are concerned. They did act upon the law which was passed, and expelled three young men, and the President said it was a plain violation of that law, and we relieved them here of the result of a violation, a plain violation of a plain law. I do not care whether the officers of the Naval Academy said they had no objection or not. We know that officers of the Government, in hearings before committees of Congress, do not say: "I am opposed," "I object," or "I recommend." They answer the questions asked. They make a report and only answer questions, so that there was nothing unusual in the officers not entering a violent protest against that report. They simply give the facts in answer to the questions asked.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these remarks are irregular and incoherent, I have been interrupted so often. I make no complaint of that. I have almost lost the thread of my discourse, but I only had one object in view; not to say: "I told you so," but there is the RECORD where I did tell you so [applause], in which I urged a year ago my reason for objecting to what I regarded as bad legislation.

I shall object again if any bill of the same kind comes before this House, without any personal feeling, but simply in the exercise of a duty that is broad and general, and based upon a demand for the best results for the whole country, and not simply the exercise of forgiveness to individuals.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As I understand the various definitions that have been given of hazing, it is ex parte punishment. For instance, they will take a green boy who has just come in there, and young men who have been there for several years, who have got smart and know how to do things, will take this boy and punish him, and no one else will be punished; but in this case of Meriwether it was a plain case of a duel, and in such a case as that both men are punished. I think the evidence taken in the Meriwether court-martial clearly shows that that fight was umpired by some officers of that institution down there. I hope I am mistaken, but I think the press reports state that the officers winked at it; that the officers knew it, and that they had had this kind of a code for duels, and so forth, down there for years. Now, that is not hazing, but is simply a plain case of dueling.

Mr. SIMS. I do not know how those facts are, but if the officers of the Naval Academy are becoming referees for fights of this kind I think we had better quit making appropriations to run the academy.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; I think we had better turn out those officers and put others in there.

Mr. SIMS. And let us see if we can find somewhere in this broad land and in this Navy of ours men who will go there for the purpose of preparing these young men for the high duties they are to perform, and let this crowd who like hazing and who defend it and the officers who wink at it go down and join the Fitzsimmonses and Jeffries in their chosen profession, at their own expense, and not as the result of taxes to be paid by our constituents.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I should like to ask the gentleman if he does not think that if these cadets are expelled and kept out it will cure this evil at the academy? I should like to ask him if the possession of a high and honorable profession, and a living for life and the possession of a commission and all that goes with it, will not be a sufficient inducement to keep these men from jeopardizing it, if they know that as soon as they are detected they will be expelled and forever barred from the opportunity to attain these desirable things? I should like to ask the gentleman if he does not think that will cure this evil?

Mr. SIMS. I think expulsion would be enough, no doubt, if adhered to, to prevent it; but where hazing is accompanied by brutality and bodily injury it should also be punished as it would be punished under the laws of all the States in this Union. I do not think simple expulsion is adequate punishment, but that the offenders should receive the same punishment they would receive if guilty of like offenses in any State of the Union.

Mr. WACHTER. I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he can give any reason for hazing or for the playing of football in the brutal manner it is played?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, why did not the gentleman ask me something easy? To me it is inconceivable that young men going there or to any other school should want to bring suffering upon younger men, who are physically inferior, simply for the purpose of seeing them suffer. It is impossible for me to conceive how anyone can want to do that. Certainly no such a young man should be an officer in the American Navy or be educated at public expense.

In closing I beg to call attention to the Department letter of Secretary Moody as to what effect the naval officers said the reappointment of the expelled cadets would have upon the continuance of hazing in the Naval Academy.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I have any time remaining, I will yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has five minutes remaining, which he yields to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in the five minutes allotted me I can only refer briefly to the statute read by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], which provides "that the Superintendent of the Military Academy shall make such rules, to be approved by the Secretary of War, as will effectually prevent the practice of hazing," etc.

The whole country has been shocked by the recent occurrences at Annapolis. Without discussing the merits of the case one way or the other, I simply call the attention of the House to the fact that the statute which has been read in reference to the Military Academy is not applicable to the Naval Academy. Both these academies are located on Federal territory. The States in which they are located have no jurisdiction to deal with the stated offenses. Therefore it is left with Congress to pass some suitable provision covering such offenses as have occurred at both these institutions. Since the statute referred to was passed it seems we have had no hazing at the Military Academy, but we have had some harrowing instances at the Naval Academy.

Without making any accusation, permit me to say the country believes that there are some officials in these institutions winking at offenses of hazing being committed there, and I must confess that by reading the testimony and studying these cases as they have appeared in the newspapers before the country it does seem that some of the officials in these institutions have encouraged or tolerated such things to some extent. Congress can put an end to hazing at these academies if it will but enact a Federal statute, exercising the power that is conferred upon this body, defining clearly what constitutes hazing, and prescribing a penalty. Then if officials at either academy wink at it, or knowingly encourage or tolerate it, let the statutory provisions make them accessories before the fact, or conspirators, subject to punishment for a crime and removal from office. [Applause.]

Mr. MUDD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have only five minutes.

Mr. MUDD. I want to say to the gentleman from Texas that the statement has been made that this fight was refereed by an officer of the academy. I want to say that that is a mistake. It is not a fact, and I want it to go into the RECORD.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I made that statement and I got it from the public press. I do not know whether it is true or not, but I believe it to be true.

Mr. MUDD. The testimony does not show anything of the kind.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, Mr. Chairman, there is a widespread belief in this country that the authorities at the academy are not frowning upon and discouraging such occurrences. There is only one way to stop hazing at these great governmental institutions. The plain remedy is to enact a most comprehensive Federal statute covering hazing and kindred crimes in their every aspect and affix a commensurate penalty suitable to every grade of the offense.

As it is now, you leave it in the hands of the Superintendent of the academy to prescribe the rule, to be the court and jury, and if some of the officials are inspiring and encouraging these infamous practices of course they will suppress all knowledge of their action and the facts in regard to them. Define what hazing is, and whenever these students who have been there a number of years take up a callow youth just entering the institution and make him stand on his head, and subject him to other similar cruelties, make that assault and battery, which it is, and punish them as their crime deserves. Wrest the power of making rules as far as possible from the Superintendent, enact a wholesome statute and then force the officials there to enforce it or take off their officials heads.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What about dueling, which I understand goes on there?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Of course the statute ought to be made so broad that it will cover that and every offense.

Mr. WACHTER. Football?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; I would stop football, unless you are the beginner with a six-shooter and club so that he may cope on equal terms with the veteran player. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HILL of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this matter is vividly before the country, and now is the time for Congress to act. We have jurisdiction of the subject-matter. We can clothe the Federal judiciary and machinery with ample power to reach these things. The States have not the power because the scene of action is on Federal territory. My contention is that a general Federal statute should be enacted taking the power of making rules out of the hands of the Superintendents of these academies on this subject. It should specifically define such pernicious practices, make them so broad that they will apply not only to the students, but to every offending official of the institution and everyone else connected with them. Then you can suppress it, but not before.

Oh, it is well enough for us to talk about inculcating the manly art in these institutions, but, as I understand it, we are not maintaining these great academies for the purpose of bringing up a race of ruffians. We are sending these young men to be educated for the service of their country, to refine them, to broaden them and make them gentlemen, and not to train them up as pugilistic prodigies to vie in the fistic graces with those notables, Jeffries, Fitzsimmons, and Corbett. [Applause.]

This is about all I care to say on this subject to-day. We have the power, and I wish to say when an opportunity is presented I shall vote for some statute broad enough to define every aspect of hazing, one swift and effective in its provisions and operations, one that will terminate these disgraceful occurrences that have brought shame to the participants, discredit to the institutions, and dishonor to the country. An honest and exhaustive investigation will test whether the officials, if they be guilty, can supinely sit by and permit assaults, murder, maiming, and brutalities; whether they can sit idly by and month after month permit the hospitals at Annapolis and West Point to be filled with victims of such encounters, bruised, bleeding, and mangled, and then blandly plead to the Government and the American people that they were ignorant and innocent of what was going on under their very eyes and what all others seemed to know. [Applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, on the 11th day of this month (December, 1905) I introduced the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the people of the United States, animated by the sympathy of a common humanity, view with deep sorrow, heartfelt commiseration, and poignant regret the deplorable condition of the people in Russia, and especially condemn and exceedingly deplore the cruel outrages, the unspeakable brutalities, and the unwarranted and wholesale assassinations of Russia's Jewish citizens; and

Whereas it is solemnly alleged, and there is a widespread and prevalent feeling throughout the world that it is true, that these terrible crimes, these brutal atrocities, and these willful murders of the Jews in Russia are connived at by the Russian Government, and have been incited by the Russian ruling classes, and are instigated directly or indirectly by high officials in Russia for political purposes, and have continued for a long time in all parts of Russia to such an extent that they have aroused the sympathies and shocked the moral sensibilities of the civilized world: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the United States, voicing the humanitarian sentiments of the American people, deplores the terrible crimes, the brutal outrages, and the uncalled-for and wanton murders of the Jews in Russia, and hereby condemns and denounces these awful outrages, these shocking assassinations, and these appalling atrocities as great international crimes against a common humanity that must be stopped, and stopped quickly, by the Russian Government; otherwise Russia, in the opinion of mankind, will and must stand indicted before the judgment bar of the world as beyond the pale of its civilization.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, that resolution expresses my sentiments in regard to the terrible crimes against the Jews in Russia; and, if I mistake not, it expresses the sentiments of most of the Members of this House of Representatives, and the heartfelt and sympathetic opinion of the humane and liberty-loving citizens of our country, who are shocked and grieved and outraged by the inhuman barbarities and appalling atrocities which have been going on for the past two years in Russia. During this short time, I am reliably informed by those most competent to testify, that more than 100,000 helpless Jews—men and women and children—absolutely defenseless and guilty of no wrong, have been cruelly, inhumanly, pitilessly, and barbarously murdered and butchered to make a Russian holiday. There has been nothing like it in all the history of the world, not even during the horrors of the Dark Ages, and humanity to-day stands aghast, stunned and grieved and horrified. It is simply impossible to describe the outrages on the Jews in Russia. Whole communities have been destroyed by fire and sword. No calamity of such magnitude has ever befallen Israel. All the horrors of the Inquisition, all the persecutions of the Middle Ages pale into insignificance in comparison with these stupendous crimes and appalling atrocities. The terrible bloody work is too frightful to contemplate; and yet we only know but a fragment of the awful truth. What a spectacle Russia presents at the dawn of the twentieth century!

Mr. Chairman, I feel deeply on this question. Only a few weeks ago 125,000 Jewish people, at the least calculation, relatives of the thousands and thousands of murdered Jews in Russia, marched through the streets in my Congressional district, clothed in somber black and crape, in a great mourning funeral procession for the martyred dead in Israel. It was one of the most impressive, one of the most striking, and one of the most pathetic scenes in all the history of the city of New York. Sadness and misery were written on every face. Bystanders took off their hats, bowed their heads in sympathy, and shed tears of sorrow. Nothing like it ever occurred before—Israel weeping and mourning for her dead—and I hope nothing like it will ever occur again in this land or any other.

But the murders go on. A veritable reign of terror exists. The black hand of ignorant fanaticism, race hatred, and religious bigotry has been raised throughout Russia against the law-abiding, peaceable, and defenseless Jews, and the barbaric work of rapine, plunder, outrage, and assassination continues and increases until even the heartless and hardened and superstitious Cossack is sickened by the bloody and ruthless scenes. Thousands and thousands of helpless men, women, and children are being slaughtered before the very eyes of civilization, and not a power lifts its voice in protest or raises a hand in condemnation. The facts—such as we get—are blood curdling and the numbers of the dead are appalling. Nothing like it ever occurred before in all the annals of time. It is a big, blood-red page in human history—a gigantic crime against a common humanity—and Russia must be forced to stop it. How, do you ask? I answer, How were the butcheries in Armenia stopped? How were the cruelties in Cuba ended? What did the powers do in China? Russia can, if Russia wants to do it, end these atrocities in a day. They must be stopped. The red reign of the Romanoffs must end. We can not look on longer without taking some decisive action. These crimes are great international crimes. The victims appeal to mankind, to the brotherhood of men, to the justice of the world. The massacres of Lodz and Odessa and Kishineff cry out to high heaven, and the time has come when the civilized world must tell Russia in no uncertain tones that these wholesale crimes against the Jews must cease, now and forever, or the civilization of this day will stand disgraced in the eyes of future generations. [Applause.]

Now, sir, I stand in my place on this floor, and charge on my responsibility as a Member of Congress, that it is solemnly alleged, and not denied, and there is a widespread and prevalent feeling throughout the world that it is true, that these terrible crimes of rapine and pillage and devastation, that these brutal atrocities, and that these monstrous murders of the helpless Jews in Russia, are secretly connived at by the Russian Government; that they have been incited by the Russian ruling classes—the grand dukes—and that they are instigated, directly or indirectly, by high officials in Russia for religious and political purposes. What a fearful indictment of Russia! Is it true? We will know some day. It is not for me to say now, however, whether these fearful charges implicating the Russian Government with direct responsibility for these atrocities on the Jews in her dominions are true or not, impartial history, sooner or later, will reveal the truth and the whole truth, and I leave that awful charge to unerring Time. But I do stand here to-day and I do say that any nation that will permit, or that does permit, or that has permitted, these terrible assassinations to go on and continue, and makes no effort to check them, deserves the condemnation of the civilized world; and that we, the representatives of the American people, have the right, true to our traditions, voicing the sentiments of our constituencies and a common humanity, to cry out against these wholesale and willful crimes against a persecuted race, and denounce these barbarous outrages upon the Jews, and to notify Russia that, in our opinion, unless she stops, and stops immediately, these assassinations of the Jews, she will place herself, in the judgment of mankind, beyond the pale of civilization. That is the position I take now, and that is the position this House should take, and we should take it at once.

Mr. Chairman, I arraign Russia before the bar of civilization for great crimes against a common humanity. The Russian Government is responsible for these outrages on the Jews. She can not avoid the awful and tremendous responsibility. I believe that Russia could stop these murders if Russia wanted to stop them. These great crimes, sir, against an oppressed race, on account of race, are not local crimes; they go beyond State lines; they are great international crimes; they are butcheries of innocent men and women and children, and in the eyes of the Master these innocent victims are our brothers and our sisters, and we would be false to ourselves, to all that we revere and hold dear, and to every dictate of humanity, if we did not denounce and cry out against them with all the vehemence of our righteous American indignation. If we do not, ours will be the shame and ours the blame. We can not evade our responsibility by asking "Am I my brother's keeper?"

Oh, yes, Mr. Chairman, I know it is said by those who speak for the Administration that our Government can do nothing; that the President and the Secretary of State can not act and have no power, according to international law, to intervene or to interfere in the internal affairs of Russia. That may or may not be true, but one thing is certain—it has been done in Turkey and in Cuba and in China; and another thing is sure, and that is, that we, the Representatives in Congress of the American people, have the right to raise our voice in protest against the plundering and the massacre, week in and week out, of thousands and thousands of poor, helpless, defenseless men, women, and children in Russia. We can do that. Let us do it. We aided the Greeks in their heroic struggle; we sympathized with the Irish in their aspirations; we interfered when the Turks massacred the Christians in Armenia, and we intervened with force of arms to aid the Cubans.

Why should we refrain from aiding the Jew in Russia? I say, in my judgment, it is our duty and the duty of the Government to condemn and denounce these Jewish atrocities and to protest against these unspeakable crimes against the Jewish people in Russia in words that can not be misunderstood, and I believe that if we do, that if we pass this resolution, that it will have the desired result and effectively put a stop to the Russian Jewish outrages, atrocities, and massacres. That right we have; let us exercise it. It will be a declaration to Russia, to the Czar, and to the grand dukes, who are directly or indirectly responsible for these crimes, that the American people and the House of Representatives of the United States sympathize with the Russian Jews the same as we would with any other outraged and downtrodden and oppressed people, and that we are opposed to these race crimes and that the ruthless extermination of the Jews in Russia must cease. If this is all we can do, let us do it, and do it quickly; and I believe that if we do our protest, our condemnation, and our denunciation will be heard in St. Petersburg and that the Russian Government will quickly see to it that the wholesale butchery of Jewish communities is stopped. We can not ignore these crimes against humanity. We can not escape our duty and our responsibility. These innocent victims are our brothers and our sisters—mankind throughout the world are one. A great and continuing crime against one race is the concern of all the other races. Can anyone who believes in the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man successfully deny it?

> For mankind are one in spirit, and one instinct bears along,
> Round the earth's electric circle, the swift flash of right or wrong;
> Whether conscious or unconscious, yet humanity's vast frame
> Through its ocean-sundered fibers feels the gush of joy or shame—
> In the gain or loss of one race all the rest have equal claim.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have said that we do not know one-half of the truth regarding the terrible crimes against the Jews in Russia. The facts at present are unobtainable. Russia suppresses them. In the dying throes of their official power, the cruel and heartless rulers of Russia have sense enough to preclude the world from knowing the awful truth of the unprecedented barbarities that are taking place within their dominions. To their credit be it said that they have decency enough to be ashamed to let the light of publicity beat on their cruel infamies and their infamous butcheries. But murder will out, and sooner or later the bright light of investigation, searching for truth, will beat upon them more fiercely than ever. Then, and not till then, will the awful calamity of the Jews in Russia be known, and when it is known I predict the revelation will be the most frightful in the annals of time, and the blackest page in all history.

Mr. Chairman, my heart goes out to the ravished and plundered and oppressed Jews in Russia. I grieve with those who grieve for the dead. I sympathize with the living and the terror stricken. I have enlisted with all my soul in their cause, and in Congress and out of Congress I shall do all that I can to aid them to ameliorate their condition. I am not a bigot. I care naught for creed. I have no race prejudice. I stand for humanity, and a man is a man, for all that, to me. I have struggled all my life to help those who needed help, to do something to better the conditions of the poor and the humble, to aid oppressed humanity in every land and in every clime, and to raise the lowly and downtrodden to a higher plane and push them forward a step further in the grand march of human progress. I shall continue my work along my own lines. I shall never turn back. I know my duty to my fellow-man, and it makes no difference to me whether he lives in the Orient or the Occident—whether he be Jew or gentile. In the battle for the right I can not go far wrong. There is nothing right but justice. I appeal for justice for the Jew, and I say to all the world that these outrages on the Jews in Russia must stop. I tell you that we can do our share to stop them. This resolution I offer is only a beginning. Let us pass it. Let us condemn and denounce the massacres of the helpless Jews in Russia, and that will accomplish something; and then let us hold a monster demonstration of protest—here in the capital of the Republic; here in the shadow of the White House—and demand, in the name of the American people and a common humanity, that official America, in a diplomatic way, serve notice on official Russia that the murders of the Jews in Russia must cease, and that will accomplish much more, and I believe effectually put a stop to these atrocities and devastations. A word from the President will go far to realize the object desired. A note of warning from the Secretary of State will have a most salutary effect. All the world applauded Theodore Roosevelt in using his good offices to bring about peace between Russia and Japan. We ask him now to use his good offices as President of the great Republic to bring peace to the harassed and maligned and outraged and persecuted Jew in Russia. He can do it if he will; and if he does, sorrowing humanity will place him on a higher pedestal, and a great race of grateful people will forever call him blessed.

Mr. Chairman, let me say to this House that I have the honor to represent in the heart of the city of New York one of the largest Jewish constituencies in the United States, and most of these people, or their parents, have come to our shores from Russia and southeastern Europe, and I want to say here, knowing them as I do, living among them, believing in them as I do, and respecting them as I do, that there are no better, no more loyal, and no more patriotic citizens in the United States. They are honest, sober, thrifty, industrious, liberty loving, and intelligent. They have come to our free land to escape the ostracism and the persecution of governments like Russia, and taking advantage of the opportunities vouchsafed them here, by frugality and industry, by perseverance and sobriety, by hope and tenacity of purpose, they have forged rapidly to the front in every line of endeavor, and they are to-day as good citizens as any other class of people in all our country. [Applause.] If anyone here will go over to the densely populated great East Side of New York, where I live, and where these people live, and where there are more people to the block than in any other like space on earth, he will be convinced of all I say regarding the Jew, and he will find among the throngs of school children in the public schools that the Jewish boys and the Jewish girls are among the brightest, the neatest, the aptest, the smartest, and the most intelligent. I know well these people; they know me, and have always been my friends; and I would be false to myself, false to my convictions, and false to every impulse of my nature, if I did not sympathize with them and do my best to comfort and aid them in the day of their greatest sadness and affliction and calamity. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, just a word of truth for the Jew and I will conclude. It is, however, unnecessary for me, or any other man, to eulogize the intrepid sons and the virtuous daughters of Israel. The Jew needs no eulogy. All he asks is justice. All he demands is equal opportunity and equality before the law. The record of his race from the dawn of time down to the present day is the history of the march of humanity along the highways of progress and the avenues of civilization. In all ages of the world the ostracized and persecuted Jew has done his share for his fellow-man, for enlightenment, for liberty, for freedom, for progress, and for civilization—and he has done it all in the face of intense adverse circumstances. In science and in art, in literature and philanthropy, the Jew, in all lands and in all times, has written his name high in the temple of human fame. In statesmanship and diplomacy, in law and in medicine, in ethics and philosophy, in research and discovery, the greatness of the Jew is and ever has been unchallenged. In commerce and in trade, in industry and husbandry, overcoming forces that would deter another, he has held his own in the vanguard of progress. Persecuted for thousands of years he has surmounted all obstacles; shunned for centuries he has kept in the very front of the higher and the better civilization. In trial and in triumph, in tempest and in sunshine, in war and in peace, on land and sea, in all eras and in all places, the Jewish race has written its enduring name and its eternal fame all over the pages of human history. Civilization owes much to the Jew; Christianity owes more. Neither debt can ever be paid. Destroy what Israel has done for the human race and you leave a void that can not be filled—an abyss which can not be bridged. Call the roll of the earth's illustrious dead and at least one name in every five will be the immortal name of a distinguished Jew who has stamped his indelible impress on the brightest pages of the world's history. [Prolonged applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CONNER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution 12.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Thursday, December 21, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian, Thursday, January 4, 1906.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 480) supplemental to the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, and for making appropriation for the isthmian canal construction, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. TELLER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, a short while ago my colleague the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] gave us a bird's-eye view of how things are at Annapolis and of the horrors that have been enacted there. We have been now out in Russia for a few moments, so I think we had better come back to Annapolis. When this matter was before the House, in relation to West Point, when we had the trouble about hazing, the position I then took on the floor of this House was that the punishment of officers who failed to stamp it out, and boys who engaged in this business, should be certain, severe, and sure. I was even opposed to the Lacey bill, that my friend the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] so eloquently championed and which passed this House. When we settled the West Point matter we thought thaf there would be an end to this business in these institutions.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. Does the gentleman not know that since 1874 the law at Annapolis provides for absolute dismissal?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. No other punishment, and absolute prevention from ever being reappointed?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. And that the very severity of the punishment prevented the officers from enforcing the law, while if there could have been some leeway up and down, so as to meet trifling offenses like the one referred to, they could not only have discovered the crimes, but could have punished them. But the punishment is so severe that the result is that they have usually done nothing.

Mr. MAHON. That law is still in force.

Mr. LACEY. Yes; but absolutely ineffective.

Mr. MAHON. And they did find a mild remedy in the Meriwether-Branch case.

Mr. LACEY. Well, in the Meriwether case a rebuke was administered to the cadet, but if instead of being convicted of assault and battery, which resulted in the death of a cadet and then being rebuked, he had been convicted of the crime of the mildest form of hazing, he would have to be punished by dismissal and practically perpetual exclusion from the Navy.

Mr. MAHON. Yes; and he ought to be punished under the act of 1874 as it stands.

Mr. WACHTER. But what right has an officer to construe the law as being too severe, when Congress has said that it is not too severe? What right has a naval officer to use any discretionary powers when the law is plain and explicit?

Mr. MAHON. He has no right to do it.

Mr. LACEY. May I answer the gentleman from Maryland in the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. Why, he has no right at all.

Mr. WACHTER. But the gentleman says that they did it, however.

Mr. LACEY. Certainly; they always did, and the effect of making a punishment beyond that which seems just——

Mr. WACHTER. To whom?

Mr. LACEY. To anybody, and shocking to mankind is that it always results in no punishment. If you made the penalty for the offense of hazing that of death, no man would ever be charged with it. Such law would be a dead letter.

Mr. WACHTER. If Congress said so it would be right, and they have no discretionary powers.

Mr. LACEY. It has been the history of every country in the world that an excessive punishment without any minimum results in the ignoring or evading of the law. That has been the case at Annapolis and at West Point.

Mr. WACHTER. Well, they have no business to do it.

Mr. MAHON. The way they have run things at Annapolis, they can find a mild way to punish a boy, but they do at present just about as they please down there. Now, in the West Point matter, when it was before this House, I advocated an amendment, which I think I offered, providing that when a young man entered either one of those institutions, in addition to the oath he ordinarily takes, there should be added to the oath that he would not engage in brutal fist fights, hazing, or any disorder of that kind, and if he were found guilty of a disobedience of that law the punishment provided was not only dismissal, but punishment by fine and imprisonment for perjury. The House contended that the honor—the high standard of honor—controlling the officers of these institutions and the cadets would prevent fighting and hazing in the future.

I am free to confess, Mr. Chairman, that I have lost all confidence and all faith in the high standard of honor as practiced at Annapolis and West Point. I am one of those who believe that when two young men or two older men deliberately plan to have a brutal fist fight that every instinct of a gentleman in that fight is wiped out. That is for dogs and not for men. I will admit there are cases when reputable men and reputable cadets, under the impulse of passion, a word said and a word flung back, may come in conflict, but there is a difference between that sort of contest with fists and fights which have been conducted deliberately and winked at by the officers of that institution.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MAHON. A moment; yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will be very glad to have the gentleman, or some one else who knows, to state it as a fact, if it is a fact, that these officers have winked at this code duello that they have had there for years and years.

Mr. MAHON. I will simply state that they must have had knowledge of it. When three or four or five boys are, as I am informed, placed in the hospital of the institution—the officer in charge of the hospital being an officer of the Navy—and when boys are brought to the hospital with their faces blackened by brutal fist blows and other injuries, with other severe injuries inflicted, it certainly shows that the surgeon is aware of it, and it is his duty to report to the officer in command. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do I understand that this code duello has existed down there for years, and this brutality, as it can well be called, has been carried on for years?

Mr. MAHON. I simply make the statement that I understand it has never been stopped at Annapolis.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The officers seem to make a distinction, or there is a distinction some one is trying to make, between hazing, which you know is ex parte punishment—they all jump on one little fellow——

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And bully some one. As I understand, it seems the code duello has been the code amongst the young men down there for years and years, but in the matter of hazing——

Mr. MAHON. That is only a more violent form of hazing. Take a young stripling, a boy of 16 years of age, who is put in the academy; the upper-class men throw themselves in his pathway to get some word or expression from him that they can take as an insult, and then make his life miserable until they get him to confront a big bully so that he can be properly beaten.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My friend is an old soldier and will agree with me that hazing is not as fair treatment of a boy as where he is given a chance to protect himself in a duel.

Mr. MAHON. It is all hazing.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Of course it is all "hazing," it seems, but there is a difference between all parties jumping one fellow and two lads fighting a duel on a common plane.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I am free to say I have an appointment to make to the academy, and I have a bright boy 16 years and 1 month old, and I have withheld his appointment, and I am very free to say if I can not send that bright little boy in my district down to Annapolis without subjecting him to this brutal treatment some other person can fill that appointment. [Applause.] He is now living among cultivated people and not in danger of the insults and fists of the big rowdies of upper class——

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I heard stated a few years ago by the father of a boy in this institution that this code of honor, as they call it, had been in operation ever since the beginning of the institution, and I submit it as a reasonable proposition that this practice could not have been carried on during all these years without the knowledge getting to the authorities of the institution.

Mr. MAHON. Yes; so has hell been in operation since the beginning of creation.

Mr. COLE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for just another suggestion? Over in the State of Ohio, you will remember, a few days ago, at Kenyon College, I believe, the boys of a certain society tied a young man on the railroad track and a train came along and killed him. These young men are indicted and will have to stand trial before a civil court for manslaughter. Now, what reason is there that these young men, sent there by the Government and kept by the Government, should not be compelled to abide by the same sort of treatment and the same sort of punishment?

Mr. MAHON. I am free to say they would get it if they were not on a military reservation. If this institution was not under the control of the Government and under the laws of Maryland the crime Meriwether committed would have put him behind the bars in some jail.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to come to another point.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MAHON. I will.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman said something about a statute of 1874 being ample to cover these cases.

Mr. MAHON. I recall the law.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I would like the gentleman to tell me what that is.

Mr. MAHON. My friend from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] is very familiar with it.

Mr. LACEY. I can state it. In 1874 a law was passed providing that hazing at Annapolis should be punished by dismissal. That was the only punishment provided by law; and that dismissal should prevent the dismissed cadet from ever again being appointed to Annapolis.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That applied only to Annapolis?

Mr. LACEY. Only to Annapolis. In 1903 a bill was passed for West Point, which provided in the case of the dismissal of a cadet for hazing he should not be eligible for appointment in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or any naval or military academy for two years after the graduation of the class to which he belonged. That was the change in the law, and afterwards that same bill was brought into the House and adopted as to Annapolis, without any reference being made to the act of 1874. The committee evidently overlooked the fact that the act of 1874 existed, because no reference was made to it.

The point I make is this, that the statutory punishment is not too severe in a great many cases. In the three cases to which such allusion has been made—practically it was not hazing at all, but technically it could be called so—nothing short of dismissal and exclusion from the Navy could be imposed upon the parties found guilty. And if we would give some latitude to the officers there they could enforce the law; but to say that because one man tells another to stoop down and stand up, and to stoop down and stand up, a couple or more of times, he shall be dismissed for doing it, and, being dismissed, shall be ineligible to being appointed again in the Army or Navy, is simply ridiculous; and the result is that the cadets refuse to testify or give information, because they know that the only punishment that can be inflicted is an extravagant one; one that shocks their own sense of fairness. And therefore they keep their complaints to themselves, and the officers find themselves unable to enforce the law because the only way to enforce it is by imposing a punishment that shocks the conscience of a court-martial.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. After the clear statement made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] it would seem clear that the law, being inflexible now, is too mild to apply to the extreme cases and too extreme to apply to the mild ones. Therefore the punishment is not suitable, and that both of those statutes should be so amended that we can have a sliding scale of punishment that is commensurate with the crime.

Mr. MAHON. The act of 1874 is a good law. The amendment of it would be a weak thing for this House to do.

Now, what is hazing? The gentleman from Iowa says a boy stoops down and puts his hands on the ground. I believe that is what they call something like "setting up." There is nothing in the mere fact of making a boy put his head down. But the whole system of hazing, from the slightest to the greatest, is to humiliate the young man when he enters that institution. Gentlemen know that as well as I do.

Mr. Chairman, I know of an instance at West Point which occurred not long ago. I heard it from a cadet. A young lad went there and he was made to stand guard all night when they were out in camp. The older class men watched the officer of the day, and the young man was made to stand from 8 o'clock at night until daylight with his musket at shoulder, guarding a dead rat lying at his feet. That did not hurt anybody. That did not hurt the boy particularly, but it was intended to humiliate the boy. Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe in the case of these young cadets who enter these institutions, and who are outraged and insulted by upper class men, if there is anybody to use their fists or use a bludgeon, let it be the young boy who can go in and club or knock down the first high tough who insults him.

Mr. Chairman, I want to call your attention to another matter: Somebody through the press has undertaken to charge that the trouble in this matter has been caused by the action of the House in the Fifty-eighth Congress adopting the bill which my friend from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] so earnestly advocated and had passed. At the time I was opposed to restoring these cadets, but a message comes from the President, supporting one by the Secretary of the Navy, that under certain conditions the restoration to the service of these boys would not have any bad effect upon the academy; and I allowed myself to be hoodwinked and bamboozled in the matter and voted for it. I will not vote again for such a bill.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me a question in this connection? There ought to be, perhaps, some legislation upon the matter. Take the case of General Sheridan's boy, who went to West Point. Of course they had some fun with him. They made him sit in a saddle on a clotheshorse, and had him recite Buchanan Read's "Sheridan's Ride." Now, that was hazing. Would you dismiss all those boys who played a joke like that upon a boy who had been appointed to West Point? Would you bar those boys forever from the Army?

Mr. MAHON. I would say that that was not hazing. If I was the officer in charge I would have sense enough to make a distinction between play and hazing.

Mr. LACEY. But that is hazing.

Mr. MAHON. Some one, through a newspaper—I do not know whether it is the press agent of the Panama Canal [laughter]—has undertaken to show to the country that this House was censurable for the lack of discipline down there on account of reinstating these boys. Now, what is that act? It is short:

That the President be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered in his discretion—

It was left entirely to the discretion of the President whether these boys should be reinstated without weakening the discipline of that institution—to appoint to the naval service the three midshipmen of the then first class who were dismissed on the 6th day of November, 1903, pursuant to the findings and recommendations of a court-martial——

Mr. LACEY. I want to correct my friend there; the bill does not authorize their reinstatement at all.

Mr. MAHON. I am coming to that.

Mr. LACEY. Reappointment to the Navy.

Mr. MAHON (continuing)— said midshipmen to take rank at the foot of the class from which dismissed, and to serve at sea in like manner as the other members of said class: Provided, That such appointments shall not be operative or effective unless and until said midshipmen shall have passed such examinations and conformed to such requirements as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy.

Now, this bill did not make these boys go back to the academy to join their class, because they had shown to Congress and to the court-martial that tried them that they were not worthy to go back to the academy and join their class; that their conduct was such that it would be demoralizing to the discipline of the institution; but they had to go away somewhere and pass an examination, and then they were appointed to the Navy and put into the service. In other words, that they were not proper subjects to go back to the academy on account of their former conduct—could not even join their class and take their examination—but they were proper men to send away for examination and be made officers on our great battle ships.

Mr. LACEY. I would like again to correct my friend. There was no such proposition involved as that. The class had all graduated. The time of the class had expired. These boys were within three months of graduation when dismissed. To send them back again was an entirely useless thing. They simply missed their examination, and it required them to take another examination, but deprived them from getting a diploma, not to disgrace them.

Mr. MAHON. The Superintendent of the academy was bitterly opposed to these boys going back to the academy.

Mr. LACEY. Certainly; but not to their going into the Navy.

Mr. MAHON. "I was opposed to these boys going back to the academy or into the Navy."

The Superintendent of the academy wanted them sent somewhere else to be examined, and then they could go and take positions as officers on a gunboat, a cruiser, or a battle ship. He did not want them to go to the academy and be treated like other cadets—compel them to graduate like all the other boys and get their two years' cruise at sea.

Mr. LACEY. They have to take their two years' cruise at sea, but at the foot of the class.

Mr. MAHON. Congress is not to blame fully for their restoration to service, but through some influence coming from the Navy Department, some from Secretary of the Navy, up through the President, into this House, to persuade us to restore these three cadets and put into the Navy those who should never have gone there.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one other thought and then I am done. The case of Branch and Meriwether was a gross and outrageous violation of the rules of the academy, a prearranged fight between an upper class man and a lower class man, with referees appointed to see that there was a fair fight. That was only the culmination of a long system of the hazing of Branch which resulted in that brutal fight.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman know who the officers were or who the men were who had charge of that duel? I used the word "officers" a while ago. I do not know that they were "officers." I want to find out if they were; all my information is derived from the press, which used the word "officers."

Mr. MAHON. The testimony taken before that court-martial shows who the referees were.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thought perhaps the gentleman knew. I have not read the testimony except what I saw in the papers. I do not want to do anyone any injustice. These "officers" may not have been, and I hope were not, the officers in charge of the academy.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield for a further question? He said a moment ago that this affair was a gross violation of the laws and regulations of the academy. Can the gentleman give us any information whether the laws of the State of Maryland permit prize fighting within the limits of that State?

Mr. MAHON. No, sir.

Mr. MUDD. The Naval Academy is not under the jurisdiction of the State laws. It is a Federal reservation.

Mr. MAHON. It is a military reservation.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Then does the gentleman say that the criminal laws of that State have no jurisdiction there?

Mr. MUDD. The Federal courts have jurisdiction.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is a Federal matter, I should say, but I have some doubts about it.

Mr. MUDD. There is no law in Maryland authorizing prize fighting.

Mr. MAHON. It is a military reservation, and it is an open question whether the civil authorities can punish for a crime committed on those grounds. That question is now before the Attorney-General of the United States to be settled—whether the civil or Federal courts can go in there and take hold of a man and punish him.

Mr. WACHTER. I want to say for the information of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] that the United States district attorney from Baltimore was in attendance upon that court-martial as the representative of the Government.

Mr. MAHON. If I was the United States district attorney in that district I would have made a very strong effort to have brought the offenders into the criminal court to punish them for the life taken. I think the Federal authorities have the power.

Now, Mr. Chairman, Congress is not to blame. The responsibility can not be thrown on Congress. This legislation which we passed in the Fifty-eighth Congress was on a recommendation from the Navy Department and the President. Whether it was right or wrong, if there is any responsibility for this lax discipline, getting worse and worse, it does not rest upon the Congress of the United States. We act largely on the recommendations of the heads of the different bureaus of the Government, who are supposed to know the facts.

Now, how are you going to cure this evil? I was a boy once, and probably if I had been a midshipman at Annapolis I might have gotten into the same trouble. Boys will be boys the world over, and you can not change them. If they are permitted to practice these brutal things in our institutions they will practice them; but, as was stated before, Mr. Chairman, the boys are not at the root of this trouble. The trouble is with the men who have charge of them. Think of an officer in the Navy—a man who has been educated at the expense of the Government, whose position has thrown him amongst the best and most cultured society—think of such an officer permitting these brutalities. It is almost beyond the pale of belief of even a Member of Congress. But I am firmly convinced, and it will take a great deal to change my conviction, that the officers at the Naval Academy have known that this thing has been going on; that sufficient efforts have not been made to punish hazing; that there has been no restraining arm put upon these young boys, full of young blood, but that the condition of things there has been winked at and encouraged by the officers of the Navy, who have somehow or from somewhere got it into their heads that you can not make brave men and gentlemen out of boys unless they are put through these brutal practices and fights during their educational career. That is the belief that prevails in the Army and in the Navy. If you sit down and discuss it with them, they say that it makes brave and heroic men to put these young men through these practices. I assert the contrary, and that a brutal prize fight will degrade and lower the gentlemanly instincts in a young man. It is not going to make him braver or better.

Now, I understand a resolution has been offered to investigate not only the boys, but to investigate the officers in charge of the academy. It is a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD]. It has been referred to the Committee on Rules. I hope that dignified committee, all gentlemen of culture and distinction, will give us a chance at it in the near future, and if this House gets a chance at it, some of these gentlemen will be taught a lesson that they will not forget, at least until they are put on the retired list. [Laughter.] If the Committee on Rules forgets it—and they may, for they are pretty busy—there may be a motion to discharge the committee from its consideration.

A MEMBER. Let us hear the resolution.

Mr. MAHON. The resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be, and is hereby, directed to make a thorough investigation of the situation and conditions at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, and especially to ascertain and report whether there have been violations of law and the regulations governing the academy, and especially whether there has been hazing, fagging, running, and class fist fighting in practice there, and the knowledge of and responsibility of the officers of the academy for any conditions found. Such committee may act by a subcommittee, if found advisable, and may sit at the Capitol or at the Naval Academy or elsewhere, and may send for persons and papers and examine witnesses and take such other action as may be found necessary.

Now, I want to suggest to the Naval Committee that they call the surgeon at Annapolis and ask him how many boys with broken noses, blackened faces, and bruised heads he has treated within the last year or two. When they get his answer, it will be something to start on.

I want to make another suggestion to the Naval Committee—a committee that I have very high regard for. That is this: That if we can not get the officers to enforce the law we shall take every cadet and make him take a solemn oath that he will not only support the Constitution of the United States, the laws, and the flag, but to raise his hand before high heaven and take a solemn oath that he will not in any manner, shape, or form take any part or be guilty of any practice of this kind in either of our military of naval institutions. Then we will put him on his honor, and he either must refrain from this practice or else he must stand before his fellows as a perjured man.

Mr. MUDD. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. MUDD. If I am not altogether wrong, these cadets—all of them—take an oath now to obey all the regulations of the academy. One of the regulations is not to engage in hazing.

Mr. MAHON. I know they take it, but they do not pay any attention to it; they take it with a mental reservation.

Mr. MUDD. But the gentleman said that he would require them to take the oath. I want to say that they take that oath now.

Mr. MAHON. The rules and regulations as they construe it is what they take the oath to keep.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But the proposition as put by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is much broader than the one suggested by the gentleman from Maryland. The gentleman from Pennsylvania said they should have an oath to uphold "the laws and Constitution of the United States."

Mr. MAHON. There is a great deal of mental reservation in taking the oath at Annapolis.

Mr. MUDD. But how will the gentleman stop the mental reservation?

Mr. MAHON. If the boy takes the oath that he will not engage in a fist fight or hazing in these institutions and it can be proved that he does, he is guilty of perjury, and punishment in the Federal courts of the United States will follow, if he is on a military reservation.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I understand there are others on the list who wish to address the committee, and as it is getting late, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House resolution 42 and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. DALE, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of bill H. R. 15577, Fifty-eighth Congress, providing for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at Carbondale, Pa., no adverse report having been made thereon.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

H. R. 299. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River by the Portland and Seattle Railway Company.

H. J. Res. 48. Joint resolution to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1905, on the 20th day of said month.

And then, on motion of Mr. DALZELL (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1539) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1540) to increase the efficiency of the Ordnance Department of the United States Army, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. ELKINS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 979) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the Winnipeg, Yankton and Gulf Railroad Company to construct a combined railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Yankton, S. Dak.," reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

WILLIAM H. HUGO, DECEASED.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, from the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 1370) for the relief of William H. Hugo, deceased.

I ask for the present consideration of the bill. A bill on the same subject has passed the Senate, I believe, at every session since I have been here. It proposes to relieve Lieutenant Hugo, who, in 1881, was cashiered and dismissed from the service by a military court-martial in time of peace, in New Mexico. His commander has recommended the passage of the bill in the most earnest words. The bill merely relieves this man, now dead, of the stain of that court-martial. His offense was being tipsy at roll call in garrison in time of peace. This man was one of the most gallant soldiers who fought in the civil war. He was twice promoted for gallantry on the field. His commander recommends the passage of the bill for his relief. It carries no money and no promotion, but it merely relieves the family of the stain and enables them to associate with the families of the fellow-soldiers of the dead man. That is the whole of the bill, and I ask that it be passed now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill reported by him.

Mr. FRYE. Let it be read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to review and revoke the order of court-martial of William H. Hugo, late a lieutenant of cavalry in the Army of the United States, and the status of the said William H. Hugo shall be as though he had never been separated from the service of the United States: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue or become payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZA A. LEMON.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. SCOTT, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Eliza A. Lemon, widow of H. H. Lemon, late a member of the Capitol police force, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his demise, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

STATISTICS RELATING TO PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. There has been presented, Mr. President, in this body a bill relating to the public schools of the District, and likewise one in the other House. It is a matter which is attracting a great deal of attention. I understand that other bills are to follow.

I have had some statistics very carefully collected relating to the schools in Washington, as well as in certain other cities, which will be very helpful to the committee in considering that important matter, and I beg to ask unanimous consent to have the paper printed as a Senate document and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. HEYBURN. I submit a resolution and ask that it may lie on the table, to be taken up for consideration at another time.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, instructed to send to the Senate of the United States a statement of all moneys received and disbursed on account of the creation of forest reserves, and in the management and control thereof, since July 1, A. D. 1903; also a statement of sections 16 and 36 of the public lands set aside for educational purposes which have been included within any forest reserves created and within any lands withdrawn from entry and settlement in anticipation of the creation of any forest reserve, giving such information separately as to each reserve and designating the State or Territory in which such reserve and sections are situated; also the amount of surveyed public land subject to be selected by the State or Territory in lieu of said sections 16 and 36 so included in said forest reserves and the character of such land subject to such lieu selection, giving the location of such land.

MESSENGER FOR COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL EXPOSITIONS.

Mr. KEAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on Industrial Expositions be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of $1,440 per annum, until otherwise provided by law

MESSENGER FOR COMMITTEE ON INTEROCEANIC CANALS.

Mr. MILLARD submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interoceanic Canals be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger at an annual salary at the rate of $1,440 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF THE INTERIOR OF PORTO RICO.

On motion of Mr. FORAKER, it was Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate be instructed to take from the files of the Senate the original manuscript of the Report of the Commissioner of the Interior of Porto Rico for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1905, printed as Senate Document No. 59, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, and return the same to the Secretary of the Interior.

BRIDGE AT NOME CITY, ALASKA.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 955) authorizing the city of Nome, a municipal corporation organized and existing under chapter 21, Title III, of an act of Congress approved June 6, 1900, entitled "An act making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes," to construct a free bridge across the Snake River at Nome city, in the Territory of Alaska.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, let the bill be read for the information of the Senate before any request is made that it may now be considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE AT YANKTON, S. DAK.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 312) to extend the time for the completion of a bridge across the Missouri River at Yankton, S. Dak.

Mr. FRYE. Let it be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 7, after the words "South Dakota," to insert "as amended by the act approved January 27, 1905;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 6 of the act approved March 9, 1904, authorizing the Yankton, Norfolk and Southern Railway Company to construct a combined railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Yankton, S. Dak., as amended by the act approved January 27, 1905, be, and is hereby, amended by extending the time for commencing the construction of said bridge to March 9, 1907, and by extending the time for completing said bridge to March 9, 1909.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MINING CLAIMS.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 93) to amend section 2326 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to mining claims.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that all suits brought pursuant to the provisions of section 2326 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in support of an adverse claim filed in any United States land office against an application for patent for a mining claim shall be deemed actions at law, to be tried as other actions at law are tried in the courts having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, it will be an accommodation to me if the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of executive business. There are three or four nominations which have been neglected in the Senate for some days, and I should like to have them disposed of. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

WIDENING OF BLADENSBURG ROAD.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 55) for the widening of Bladensburg road, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill the title of which he has named. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The bill was read; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WIDENING OF COLUMBIA ROAD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Unless there is some other business to be transacted, there is on the Calendar the bill (S. 68) for the widening of a section of Columbia road east of Sixteenth street which I should like to have considered. A similar bill passed the Senate at the last session, and it is recommended by the Commissioners.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, in section 7, page 6, line 5, after the word "appropriated," to strike out "one half from" and insert "out of," and in line 6, after the word "Columbia," to strike out "and the other half out of any moneys in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That when the verdict of said jury shall have been finally ratified and confirmed by the court, as herein provided, the amounts of money awarded and adjudged to be payable for lands taken under the provisions hereof shall be paid to the owners of said land by the disbursing officer of the District of Columbia from moneys advanced to him by the Secretary of the Treasury upon requisitions of the Commissioners of said District, as provided by law; and a sufficient sum to pay the amounts of said judgments and awards is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIFE-SAVING STATION AT GREENHILL, R. I.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent to call up from the Calendar for present consideration the bill (S. 280) to provide a life-saving station at or near Greenhill, on the coast of South Kingston, in the State of Rhode Island. It is the first bill on the Calendar.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MALLORY. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is; and the report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. DEPEW on the 14th instant, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 280) to provide a life-saving station at or near Greenhill, on the coast of South Kingston, in the State of Rhode Island, having considered the same, report with a recommendation that it pass.

A similar bill was favorably reported from this committee in the Fifty-eighth Congress and passed the Senate, but failed to receive consideration in the House. The report of the committee on that bill is as follows:

"The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 7173) to provide a life-saving station at or near Greenhill, on the coast of South Kingston, in the State of Rhode Island, having considered the same, report with a recommendation that it pass.

"A similar bill was favorably reported from this committee in the Fifty-fourth Congress, having the sanction of the Acting Secretary of the Treasury and the Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, as will appear by the following letters which were printed in the report on that bill:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
"Washington, D. C., January 25, 1897.

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your reference of the 21st instant of bill S. 3569, 'To provide a life-saving station at or near Greenhill, on the coast of South Kingston, in the State of Rhode Island,' and asking for suggestions touching its merits and the propriety of its passage.

"In reply, I have to state that the matter was referred to the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service for report, which has been received and is herewith transmitted, with my concurrence.

"Respectfully, yours,

"W. E. CURTIS, Acting Secretary.

"The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE,
"United States Senate.

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
"OFFICE OF THE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT
"LIFE-SAVING SERVICE,
"Washington, D. C., January 25, 1897.

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your reference, for report, of the letter of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, transmitting bill (S. 3569) to provide a life-saving station at or near Greenhill, on the coast of South Kingston, in the State of Rhode Island, for suggestions touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

"A bill of the same import was introduced in the House of Representatives during the Fifty-third Congress, and in response to a similar request from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I, under date of February 5, 1894, reported to the Secretary of the Treasury my views thereon, concurring in those expressed by certain officers of the Life-Saving Service that such a station is desirable.

"I inclose a copy of this report and beg that it may be accepted as my report upon the present bill.

"Respectfully, yours,

"S. I. KIMBALL,
"General Superintendent.

"The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY."

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT LIFE-SAVING SERVICE,
"Washington, D. C., February 5, 1894.

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your reference, for report, of the letter of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives, dated September 13, 1893, inclosing bill (H. R. 218) entitled 'A bill to provide a life-saving station at or near Greenhill, on the coast of South Kingston, in the State of Rhode Island,' for suggestions touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

"Desiring the views of the officers of the district which embraces the point referred to, I addressed letters to them asking for the same. The inspecting officer replies:

"'In regard to the establishment of a station at Greenhill I respectfully state that in my judgment this part of the coast, from its exposed situation, would be better protected by the addition of another station at or near the place mentioned for the following reasons: The distance between Quonochontaug and the Point Judith stations, following the shore, is about 14 miles. The patrols from these stations cover but a small part of this distance, leaving a long stretch unprotected.

"'By the addition of a station halfway between these points, which would lie in the immediate vicinity of Greenhill, the coast could be practically patrolled from the Pattaquamscott River to Noyes Point, leaving about 3 miles from the first-mentioned point to Watch Hill not covered by the patrols of the life-saving force. In view of the large number of vessels of all classes constantly passing and repassing this part of the Rhode Island coast to and from Long Island Sound, through the "Race" and Fishers Island Sound, it is my unbiased opinion that the establishment of a station in the vicinity of Greenhill would increase the efficiency of the Service and justify the cost of erecting and maintaining it.'

"The district superintendent reports:

"'The station contemplated at Greenhill, I think, would be of service, as it, in connection with the one already at Quonochontaug, would about cover the coast from Point Judith to Watch Hill.'

"The assistant superintendent of the district says:

"'In my judgment, stations at these points (Greenhill and Watsons Pier) would be of great benefit to all marine interests and are much needed. With a station at Greenhill the most dangerous parts of the shore from Point Judith to Watch Hill would be guarded.'

"I concur in the views of these officers.

"Respectfully, yours,

"S. I. KIMBALL,
"General Superintendent.

"The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask leave to call up for present consideration the bill (S. 653) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Illinois.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate the sum of $25,000 for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Illinois.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JUVENILE COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar is in order.

Mr. LODGE. I was going to suggest a recess, as I think all the bills have been taken from the Calendar which could be passed without debate or objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from New Hampshire has another bill to call up, I will yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. If there is no objection to a bill on the Calendar (S. 51), which is similar to the one that was passed at the last session, creating a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia, I would like very much to have it considered, and will ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire. Is this measure drawn up on the plan of the juvenile courts which have been so successful in two or three parts of the country?

Mr. GALLINGER. It follows precisely the form of the bills enacted in several of the States, and is very carefully guarded in every particular.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will give us a little explanation about it. I am sure I do not exactly appreciate the effect of it—how far it will go. Will the Senator from New Hampshire, in just a word or two, give us an idea of the scope of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. President, at the last session we had a similar bill before the Committee on the District of Columbia, which was submitted to the Commissioners for their consideration, and they proposed several amendments, which were very important and which are incorporated in this bill. As I understand, the bill simply provides for a court for juvenile offenders, separating them from offenders of adult age; and the Senator from Georgia knows that in this city particularly the police court is not a very good place in which to try children. The bill provides for a judge at a salary of $3,000, and merely creates a separate court for juvenile offenders, giving considerable latitude to the judge in the matter of punishment. It is following precisely what has occurred in the legislation of California, some of the New England States, and I think in other parts of the country.

Mr. PERKINS. In Pennsylvania.

Mr. GALLINGER. In Pennsylvania.

Mr. CULLOM. And Illinois.

Mr. GALLINGER. And in Illinois and other States, and they have been a great success. This bill has been drawn along those lines guarded, I feel sure, with great care, and some of us believe that if enacted into law, as I trust it will be, it will have a very beneficial effect upon the children of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SPOONER. It is one of those tribunals which depends for its success almost entirely upon the person who is chosen for judge.

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. SPOONER. He must be a man who cares more for children and their welfare than for the strict enforcement of law.

Mr. GALLINGER. The suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin is certainly a wise one. The appointment of a judge to administer this bill, if it shall become a law, is really a matter of surpassing importance.

Mr. SPOONER. I have followed with a good deal of interest the development of these tribunals in two or three places in the country, and have read much about them. I think it is one of the finest of all the modern improvements in the way of caring for children who are without adequate paternal care. It gives them a chance.

Mr. BACON. The bill provides for the trial of juvenile offenders?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. Under 17 years.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under 17 years of age.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether there is any provision either in this bill or under any existing law in the District by which juvenile convicts are separated from the others. I think it is very much more important than the court to make provision so that those who are convicted shall not be herded with the older convicts. The great need of reformation—very much more so than the court—is in what you shall do with the juvenile offender when he has been convicted of crime. This bill, it seems, went to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I do not know whether it is practicable or whether it would be within the jurisdiction of this bill to so enlarge it as to incorporate that feature, which I regard as much more important of the two.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to state for the information of the Senator from Georgia that there is now in the District of Columbia, under the control of the Department of Justice, both a reformatory for girls and one for boys, under the age of 17, to which juvenile offenders below that age are committed.

Mr. BACON. Very well. That is a very important piece of information, Mr. President, and adds very largely, I think, to the importance of this bill. So I understand that all convicts would go from this juvenile court to the reformatories mentioned by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GALLINGER. They would go to the reformatories, certainly, for girls and boys, which are institutions well established here.

Mr. BACON. Very well; that is an important point.

Mr. MALLORY. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I will call his attention to the feature of this bill which prescribes that, in the judgment of the court, the court may suspend sentence and put the juvenile offender on his good behavior, giving an opportunity to reform rather than send him to jail.

Mr. BACON. I desire to say that with that feature now in the existing law, I very heartily approve of this additional bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I am informed that the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Panama appropriation bill will be ready very shortly to report, and are anxious to dispose of the matter to-day, if possible, so as to clear the way for the adjournment for the holidays. I therefore move that the Senate take a recess for half an hour.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 2 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m., when it reassembled.

PANAMA CANAL APPROPRIATION.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the conferees of the two Houses on House bill 480 have met and agreed upon a report, which I present to the Senate, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report of the committee of conference will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 480) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902 and making appropriation for isthmian canal construction, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2 and 3 and from its amendment to the title of the bill.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

"That the 2 per cent bonds of the United States authorized by section 8 of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans,' approved June 28, 1902, shall have the rights and privileges accorded by law to other 2 per cent bonds of the United States, and every national banking association having on deposit, as provided by law, such bonds issued under the provisions of said section 8 of said act, approved June 28, 1902, to secure its circulating notes, shall pay to the Treasurer of the United States, in the months of January and July, a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent each half year upon the average amount of such of its notes in circulation as are based upon the deposits of said 2 per cent bonds; and such taxes shall be in lieu of existing taxes on its notes in circulation imposed by section 5214 of the Revised Statutes."

And the Senate agree to the same.

W. B. ALLISON,
EUGENE HALE,
H. M. TELLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. P. HEPBURN,
SERENO E. PAYNE,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, as I understand the report of the committee of conference, the first section of the bill is amended so as to make it identical with the bill (S. 1475) which recently passed the Senate in relation to the taxation of bonds held by national banks as security for circulating notes.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I suppose I need not remind the Senate of the conditions and circumstances under which the bill to which I refer was passed by the Senate. I was personally very greatly surprised when the bill came back from the other House with a message that the House held its adoption by the Senate to be in contravention of section 7 of Article I of the Constitution. I believe it will be found that neither House of Congress has ever held that bills imposing or reducing taxes upon national banks were revenue bills within the meaning of the Constitution. The section, as it came from the House and as it is proposed to be adopted in the conference report, is an amendment of section 13 of the refunding act of March, 1900, which originated in the Senate and was sent to the other House, where it was received and passed without the constitutional question having been raised. All the provisions of the refunding act were placed in the bill by the Senate, and to this there was no objection. Other important measures affecting taxation of banks have originated in the Senate without protest.

Last year, when the isthmian canal bill, so called, was before the Senate, a similar provision to that now in controversy was inserted in that bill at the suggestion of the Finance Committee. That bill went to the other House and no constitutional objection was raised. By the rules of the House of Representatives all revenue bills—all bills relating to or affecting revenue—are referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. All bills relating to the taxation of national banks have been uniformly referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, showing very clearly that the House itself in its practice has not held bills of this nature to be revenue bills. In the very last session—and I suppose I am at liberty to speak of what occurred in that House as shown by the public records—a bill was introduced by a Member from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] containing substantially the same provisions that are now incorporated in this first section. That bill was referred by the action of the House to the Committee on Banking and Currency; it was reported back by the Committee on Banking and Currency with additional provisions as to the taxation of national banks; it was taken up for consideration without a question being raised as to its character; taken up without any claim that it was entitled to the privileges of a revenue bill; and it was discussed for weeks. No point was ever raised as to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency, nor was there any claim or suggestion on the part of anybody that the bill was a revenue bill. The claim is now made for the first time that the prerogatives of the House are invaded by legislation of this kind.

There have, in my judgment, been very good reasons why such bills have not been considered revenue bills. Taxation in this case is a mere incident of the general legislation for the management and control of national banks. The taxes imposed are not for purposes of revenue.

If the question is to be raised, it can not properly be settled by the action of one House alone; and I hope and believe that the action of the Senate in agreeing to the report of the conference committee will not be held, as it can not be held, as a waiver of any constitutional rights of this body. The matter should be taken up and considered carefully between the two Houses as to what determination shall be reached upon the question.

If the bill which came from the House of Representatives, and which is now before the Senate, is a revenue bill, if it is subject to the prohibition of section 7, Article I, of the Constitution, it is certainly also subject to the provision in the same section which gives the Senate full power of amendment. Does anybody in the Senate suppose that we could have properly amended this canal appropriation bill by placing an entire tariff bill upon it, or that we could have amended it by taking duties off this article or that article, or by increasing or diminishing internal-revenue taxes? No attempt has been made here, within my knowledge, to amend bills of this character in that way; but if the contention of the House of Representatives is to stand, if we are to change the rules and practices between the two Houses on questions of this kind, it must become apparent to all that the powers of the Senate in regard to dealing with tariff questions will be immeasurably enlarged, because if we can take any of these bills—and we have too many of them in which the power of taxation is used not for general revenue purposes, but for regulation, repression, or prohibition—and amend them as we please by tariff and internal-revenue amendments, the Senate's powers over this class of legislation is practically unlimited. But whatever may be the effect of this action, an invasion of this kind, or an attempted invasion of this kind, should be treated calmly and deliberately between the two Houses, as I hope this question will be. Certainly I shall insist that the Senate relinquishes none of its rights and makes no admission that the contention of the House is correct by the adoption of this conference report.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I rise mainly for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the Senate some authorities upon the question which the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] has been discussing. In order that in the RECORD the real issue between the House and the Senate may be made apparent, I ask the insertion, without reading, of the first section of House bill 480.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The section referred to is as follows:

That the bonds authorized by section 8 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, shall be subject to the provisions of section 13 of the act entitled "An act to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes," approved March 14, 1900, the same as though said bonds were issued under the provisions of said act of March 14, 1900.

Mr. SPOONER. It will be observed that this section refers solely to the bonds authorized by the "canal act" to be issued to provide funds for the construction of the isthmian canal.

As there seemed to be reasonable doubt concerning the construction which might be placed upon the language of the section as it came from the House, it was thought wise, in order that national banks might not be deterred by any doubt from utilizing the bonds as a basis of circulation, to employ different phraseology.

As section 1 was not germane to the appropriation contained in section 2 of the bill, and not ordinarily within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations, a bill was introduced by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], reported from the Committee on Finance, and passed by the Senate as an independent bill, although identical, except as to phraseology, with the section 1 which had come from the House. I ask that the bill be inserted in my remarks without reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The bill referred to is as follows:

A bill supplemental to an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, and making appropriation for isthmian canal construction, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the bonds authorized by section 8 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, shall be subject to the provisions of section 13 of the act entitled "An act to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes," approved March 14, 1900, the same as though said bonds were issued under the provisions of said act of March 14, 1900.

Mr. SPOONER. Thereupon, Mr. President, the following resolution was adopted by the House and, with the bill S. 1475, messaged to this body:

Resolved, That the bill S. 1475, in the opinion of the House, contravenes the first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution, is an infringement on the privileges of this House, and that the said bill be taken from the Speaker's table and be respectfully returned to the Senate with a message communicating this resolution.

The matter, of course, demands and must receive serious attention, as the public interest requires that it shall be brought speedily to a sound conclusion. The bill was returned unconsidered, with a challenge of the power of the Senate, under the Constitution, to originate it. If the House of Representatives is correct in its view that the bill is a bill "for raising revenue," within the meaning of section 7 of Article I of the Constitution, certainly the bill is properly returned and must rest here. If the House of Representatives is wrong, the Senate has no right to yield its jurisdiction. No department of the Government has any right to surrender any portion of the power or responsibility with which the Constitution has clothed it. It is vital, both as to the National Government and to the State governments, that the line of demarcation drawn by the framers of the Constitution of the United States and of the various States between the three independent and coordinate branches of the Government shall be observed always with the utmost strictness, to the end that neither shall, in the slightest degree, invade the other.

And so it is inexpressibly important that each branch of the legislature, National or State, shall keep within the constitutional limitations upon its power.

The only fear I have ever entertained, Mr. President, for the future of our Government has arisen from apparent popular toleration of or encouragement to invasions by one department of the Government of the functions of another—in the nation or in the States. There seems to be a popular complaisance upon the subject, or an indifference of public opinion, which bodes no good throughout the country. I read in a newspaper this morning, and I can here refer to no State, that the governor of a State has decided who shall be speaker of the house of representatives of that State, and it seemed to be accepted as sound governmental conduct under our system of government. It has occurred in other States. It is a tendency to be resisted, not encouraged.

Mr. President, the men who founded this Government and framed our Constitution took lessons from history and experience on the other side of the sea, and when they created the three coordinate and independent branches of the Government, assigning to each its jurisdiction, they created a government which, in its divisions, was a perfect representative or democratic government. And when the people of any State permit, under any pretext, those three branches of the Government to be reduced to two, they tolerate treason to our constitutional system.

The legislature of a State is not to be organized by the judiciary nor is it to be organized by an executive, and if the time shall ever come—and we have seen it in some States—when by passive acquiescence the execution of the law is practically combined with the making of the law, the structure in its completeness and as the fathers made it is destroyed and the distinction between it and a monarchy is largely obliterated.

Mr. President, as important as I regard that—and as I said before, it is fundamental, and our people should cling to it in season and out of season as they cling to the flag—it is likewise profoundly important that neither House of the Legislature shall transcend in its relation to the other constitutional limits. Assertion was made in the House in advocacy of the resolution for the return of the bill that at the last session the Senate invaded the prerogative of the House and upon its being resented had receded. In my judgment, at the last session of Congress the Senate transcended its rights under the Constitution and invaded the prerogative of the House. That was in the amendment to the agricultural appropriation bill by which the Senate enacted a construction of the tariff act in its relation to drawbacks. The Secretary of the Treasury had construed the drawback clause as including wheat and was admitting it free of duty. That was a question of construction. The Senate adopted an amendment to the appropriation bill declaring the drawback provisions not to include wheat.

It is not the function of legislatures to construe the laws. That is a judicial function. It may be persuasive in the court, but it is not binding upon the court, and where such an act is passed and the court is of opinion, as to past transactions, that the legislative construction is not the sound one, it stands by the judicial construction, but from the passage of the construing act it works a change in the law. Therefore the House rightly objected, in my opinion, to the amendment by the Senate to the tariff act, and the Senate did only its duty in receding from the proposition. But there is no similarity whatever between that amendment and the action here complained of.

But, Mr. President, if the House of Representatives, 357 of whose Members voted for this resolution challenging the power of the Senate, rising to make it more solemn, is right, then the Senate is deprived of a legislative jurisdiction which from the foundation of the Government it has exercised, and it is weakened in its legislative power to the detriment of the public interest. Now a word as to the obvious purpose of the bill which has been returned unconsidered. I apprehend that very few will be found to characterize it as a "tax bill." Certainly from a constitutional standpoint it is not a "bill for raising revenue."

What is its manifest object?

Under existing law the 2 per cent canal bonds heretofore authorized could, when issued, be used as a basis for national-bank circulation. Under existing law the tax upon that circulation would be 1 per cent. The law which is made by this bill to apply to the canal bonds relates to 2 per cent bonds, and to encourage their use as a basis for bank circulation reduces the tax from 1 per cent to one-half of 1 per cent. So the bill which was returned to us was simply a bill bringing these 2 per cent canal bonds upon the same basis in respect of taxation with all 2 per cent bonds of the Government.

Is it possible, Mr. President, that it can with reason be said that the object of this bill is to "raise revenue" for the support of the Government?

The question is this: Is the bill, which was introduced as a separate proposition by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and which the Senate passed, a revenue bill within the meaning of section 7 of the first article of the Constitution?

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives.

This brings us to the question: What is a "revenue bill" within the meaning of the Constitution?

The definition is well settled, thus:

Revenue laws: Laws made for the direct and avowed purpose of creating and securing revenue or public funds for the service of the Government. (Anderson's Law Dictionary, p. 899.)

This embraces clearly all bills passed in the exercise of the taxing power, whether in the form of customs duties or internal-revenue taxation, for the purpose of raising money for the support of the Government.

This definition excludes, and the constitutional provision was intended to exclude, bills passed in the exercise of constitutional powers other than the taxing power, even if they operated to raise revenue, or even if they imposed incidentally a tax or taxes to secure the more efficient and successful exercise of the power.

Such bills or laws have never been either in practice or judicially deemed "revenue" bills or laws.

Congress enacts laws from time to time which operate to raise revenue. The post-office laws operate to raise revenue. Congress frequently changes the post-office laws so as to raise more revenue. But it has not been contended for many years—it was once—that those were revenue bills within the meaning of this clause of the Constitution.

The power to create national banks is a power which exists in Congress. It is not the sole prerogative of either House. It is not the taxing power. It is legislation which Congress may enact under the money power; and the Supreme Court of the United States has so decided. The taxation imposed from the beginning upon the circulation of national banks is purely incidental to the exercise by the Congress, in creating national banks, in supplying the people with the circulation of national banks, of a distinct power vested by the Constitution in either House.

Mr. MORGAN. Was not the oleomargarine bill of the same character?

Mr. SPOONER. The oleomargarine bill was hardly of the same character, perhaps. It is a close question. The Senator puts to me the question now whether the Congress may use the taxing power solely for the purpose of regulation. In other words, he would ask me whether Congress under the Constitution may exercise the taxing power for any other purpose than to raise revenue for the general purposes of the Government.

Mr. BACON. Like the 10 per cent tax on State-bank issues.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes. I do not care to go into that question, for I wish to get along with what I have to say. I am trying to say this: It would be under the commerce power, to my mind, that the oleomargarine tax could be levied lawfully. I am not sure that I am prepared to say I like the theory of using the taxing power simply to regulate, except as a means of exercising a granted power. It has gone as far, I think, at least as it ought to go. But the tax imposed upon the circulation of State banks is a lawful tax. It was a tax enacted by the Congress under the money power. Whether a wise tax or an unwise tax, a just tax or an unjust tax, it was a constitutional tax, and it was not a tax simply for purposes of regulation.

Mr. BACON. The Supreme Court, I think, held directly to the contrary, that it was not such a tax, and was for the purpose——

Mr. SPOONER. A tax which of course was intended——

Mr. BACON. To destroy State-bank circulation.

Mr. SPOONER. To destroy State-bank circulation.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. But that was an incident to the main purpose, which was to put in its place a national circulation. So, after all, in the last analysis, it was an incident to the exercise of a conceded power, in my judgment, rather than the exercise of one power for the purpose of accomplishing indirectly an object. But let that go.

Mr. President, the definition of "revenue laws" which I read to the Senate is taken from Mr. Justice Story, (see United States v. Mayo, 1 Gall, 398, and Story on Constitution, sec. 880); and the Supreme Court, in the case of United States v. Norton, 91 United States, 568, had occasion to consider carefully the question as to what is meant by the phrase "revenue bill," or what the word "revenue" as used in section 7 of Article I of the Constitution means. This was a post-office money-order case. It was a criminal case, but the court was obliged in deciding it to pass upon the question whether it was a "revenue law" or not, because as it determined that it was or that it was not the law, it was claimed, would be valid or invalid. They say:

> In no just view, we think, can the statute in question be deemed a revenue law.
> The lexical definition of the term "revenue" is very comprehensive. It is thus given by Webster: "The income of a nation, derived from its taxes, duties, or other sources, for the payment of the national expenses."
> The phrase "other sources" would include the proceeds of the public lands, those arising from the sale of public securities, the receipts of the Patent Office in excess of its expenditures, and those of the Post-Office Department, when there should be such excess, as there was for a time in the early history of the Government. Indeed, the phrase would apply in all cases of such excess. In some of them the result might fluctuate, there being excess at one time and deficiency at another.
> It is a matter of common knowledge that the appellative "revenue laws" is never applied to the statutes involved in these classes of cases.
>
> The Constitution of the United States, Article I, section 7, provides that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives."
>
> The construction of this limitation is practically well settled by the uniform action of Congress. According to that construction, it "has been confined to bills to levy taxes in the strict sense of the words, and has not been understood to extend to bills for other purposes which incidentally create revenue." (Story on the Constitution, sec. 880.) "Bills for raising revenue" when enacted into laws become revenue laws. Congress was a constitutional body sitting under the Constitution. It was, of course, familiar with the phrase "bills for raising revenue" as used in that instrument and the construction which had been given it.
> The precise question before us—

That is, as to what was meant by a "revenue bill" under this clause of the Constitution—> came under the consideration of Mr. Justice Story, in The United States v. Mayo (1 Gall., 396). He held that the phrase "revenue laws," as used in the act of 1804, meant such laws "as are made for the direct and avowed purpose of creating revenue or public funds for the service of the Government." The same doctrine was reaffirmed by that eminent judge in the United States v. Cushman, 426.

These views commend themselves to our judgment.

Here is an interesting and original discussion of the question, and I will take but a moment with it before I bring to the attention of the Senate a decision by the Supreme Court of the United States declaring this very section involved between the Senate and the House not to be a revenue bill within that clause of the Constitution invoked by the House. I read from the case of the United States on the relation of Oran C. Michels v. Thomas L. James, postmaster of the city of New York, 13 Blatchford's Circuit Court Reports, 207. After quoting the clause "All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives," the court says:

> Certain legislative measures are unmistakably bills for raising revenue. These impose taxes upon the people, either directly or indirectly, or lay duties, imposts, or excises for the use of the Government, and give to the persons from whom the money is exacted no equivalent in return, unless in the enjoyment, in common with the rest of the citizens, of the benefit of good government.

That is a well thought out distinction and definition.

> It is this feature which characterizes bills for raising revenue—

Taxes levied throughout the United States upon all coming within the purview of the act to raise revenue for the general uses of the Government and all of the people—

> It is this feature which characterizes bills for raising revenue. They draw money from the citizen; they give no direct equivalent in return. In respect to such bills it was reasonable that the immediate representatives of the taxpayers should alone have the power to originate them. Their immediate responsibility to their constituents and their jealous regard for the pecuniary interests of the people, it was supposed, would render them especially watchful in the protection of those whom they represented. But the reason fails in respect to bills of a different class. A bill regulating postal rates for postal service provides an equivalent for the money which the citizen may choose voluntarily to pay. He gets the fixed service for the fixed rate, or he lets it alone, as he pleases and as his own interests dictate. Revenue, beyond its cost, may or may not be derived from the service and the pay received for it, but it is only a very strained construction which would regard a bill establishing rates of postage as a bill for raising revenue, within the meaning of the Constitution. This broad distinction existing in fact between the two kinds of bills, it is obviously a just construction to confine the terms of the Constitution to the case which they plainly designate. To strain those terms beyond their primary and obvious meaning, and thus to introduce a precedent for that sort of construction, would work a great public mischief. Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution (sec. 880), puts the same construction upon the language in question, and gives his reasons for the views he sustains, which are able and convincing. In Tucker's Blackstone only, so far as authorities have been referred to, is found the opinion that a bill for establishing the post-office operates as a revenue law. But this opinion, although put forth at an early day, has never obtained any general approval; but both legislative practice and general consent have concurred in the other view.

Mr. President, I now ask the attention of the Senate to the case of Twin City Bank v. Nebeker, 167 U. S., 196, which is upon the precise question, and is unanimous and conclusive. I will take the time to read a portion of the statement of the case in order that Senators may see how controlling is the decision. In this case the plaintiff bank brought suit against Nebeker, then Treasurer of the United States—> to recover from the defendant in error the sum of $73.08, alleged to have been paid by the former under protest to the latter, who was at the time Treasurer of the United States, in order to procure the release of certain bonds, the property of the bank, which bonds, the declaration alleged, were illegally and wrongfully withheld from the plaintiff by the defendant.

> The plaintiff went into liquidation—

That is, the bank—

> in the manner provided by law, on the 23d of June, 1891, and on the 25th of August, 1891, deposited in the Treasury of the United States lawful money to redeem its outstanding notes, as required by section 5222 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. After making such deposit the bank demanded the bonds which had been deposited by it to secure its circulating notes, and of which defendant had possession as Treasurer of the United States. The defendant refused to deliver them, unless the bank would make a return of the average amount of its notes in circulation for the period from January 1, 1891, to the date when the deposit of money was made—viz, the 25th of August, 1891—and pay a tax thereon. The bank then made a return of the average amount of its notes in circulation for the period from January 1 to June 30, 1891, and paid to the defendant $56.25, protesting that he had no authority to demand the tax, and delivered to him a protest in writing setting forth that, in making the return and in paying the tax, it did not admit the validity of the tax or defendant's authority to exact or collect it, but made the return and payment solely for the purpose of procuring the possession of the United States bonds belonging to it, which defendant had refused to release until such return and payment were made, and further protesting that it was not liable to the tax or any part of it. The bank's agent then made another demand upon defendant for the bonds; but he refused to deliver them until a return should be made of the average amount of its notes in circulation for the period from July 1 to August 25, 1891, and a tax paid thereon. Its agent then delivered such return to defendant and paid him $16.83, at the same time delivering a written protest in the same form as the one above mentioned. These transactions were with the defendant himself, and the money was paid to him in person.
> The Journals of the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States for the first session of the Thirty-eighth Congress were put in evidence by plaintiff. The bank claims that these Journals show that the national-bank act originated as a bill in the House of Representatives; that when it passed the House it contained no provision for a tax upon the national banks, or upon any corporation, or upon any individual, or upon any property, nor any provisions whatever for raising revenue, and that all the provisions that appear to authorize the Treasurer of the United States to collect any tax on the circulating notes of national banks originated in the Senate by way of amendment to the House bill.

Which is the fact. The court say:

> The provision relating to taxation, which, it is alleged, was inserted by way of amendment in the Senate, appears as section 5214 of the Revised Statutes.

I am told by my friend the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] that that is the very section involved here.

Mr. ALLISON. The same section.

Mr. SPOONER. The same section.

Now, the court says:

> The contention in this case is that the section of the act of June 3, 1864, providing a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and for the circulation and redemption thereof, so far as it imposed a tax upon the average amount of the notes of a national banking association on circulation, was a revenue bill within the clause of the Constitution declaring that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills" (Article I, section 7); that it appeared from the official journals of the two Houses of Congress that while the act of 1864 originated in the House of Representatives, the provision imposing this tax was not in the bill as it passed that body, but originated in the Senate by amendment, and being accepted by the House became a part of the statute; that such tax was, therefore, unconstitutional and void; and that consequently the statute did not justify the action of the defendant.

The question could not, I think, be more clearly presented to the court than it is upon this statement of fact. The court say:

> The case is not one that requires either an extended examination of precedents or a full discussion as to the meaning of the words in the Constitution "bills for raising revenue." What bills belong to that class is a question of such magnitude and importance that it is the part of wisdom not to attempt, by any general statement, to cover every possible phase of the subject. It is sufficient in the present case to say that an act of Congress providing a national currency, secured by a pledge of bonds of the United States, and which, in the furtherance of that object, and also to meet the expenses attending the execution of the act, imposed a tax on the notes in circulation of the banking associations organized under the statute, is clearly not a revenue bill which the Constitution declares must originate in the House of Representatives.
> Mr. Justice Story has well said that the practical construction of the Constitution and the history of the origin of the constitutional provision in question proves that revenue bills are those that levy taxes in the strict sense of the word, and are not bills for other purposes which may incidentally create revenue. (1 Story on Constitution, sec. 880.)

That was the language of Mr. Justice Story long ago, incorporated in this opinion and expressly affirmed, and also in the Ninety-first United States, by unanimous decision of the Supreme Court. The court continues:

> The main purpose that Congress had in view was to provide a national currency based upon United States bonds, and to that end it was deemed wise to impose the tax in question. The tax was a means for effectually accomplishing the great object of giving to the people a currency that would rest primarily upon the honor of the United States and be available in every part of the country. There was no purpose by the act or by any of its provisions to raise revenue to be applied in meeting the expenses or obligations of the Government.

Now, Mr. President, I do not intend to take further time. Here is to be found, under the strongest possible sanction, a definition of the word "revenue," as used in this constitutional provision, made a great many years ago by Judge Story, practically adopted by both bodies ever since, sustained by a number of decisions which I have not stopped to even note, and lastly sustained in language too plain for dispute by the Supreme Court of the United States. Nothing can be plainer than that this bill and kindred bills do not fall within that definition.

There seems to be no answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] that if section 1 as sent to us by the House of Representatives is a revenue bill within the meaning of section 7 of Article I of the Constitution we have a right under that clause to add to it a tariff bill or amendments to the internal-revenue law. An attempt to treat the bill as a revenue bill for such a purpose could not fail to excite derision.

Mr. President, I can not take more time. I am conscious of the very imperfect presentation of a very strong and sound proposition.

The Senate is about seemingly to recognize some force in the contention of the House.

Mr. TELLER. How?

Mr. SPOONER. By incorporating the same provision in a little different language in the House bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is the same language.

Mr. SPOONER. The same language is used that is found in the Senate bill. But, Mr. President, that is to the credit of the Senate. It does not mean that the Senate yields in the slightest upon the point. In my view, to do this would be infidelity to the Constitution, and would be full of harm to the public interest. It means simply this, that without any temper, with, I think, the unanimous opinion among the lawyers of this body that the jurisdiction of the Senate to originate and pass returned to us the bill has been hastily and without foundation challenged by the House of Representatives, the Senate will not delay for one moment the passage of this emergency bill for prolonged conferences between the two houses on this question.

Mr. President, I intend to move at the proper time a reference to the Committee on Finance of the message from the House of Representatives with instructions to that committee to report fully to the Senate upon the subject.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the point raised by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and so ably discussed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. I simply want to make the statement to the Senate that when Congress authorized the construction of the canal I thought then that this vast work should be intrusted to the engineers of the Army. I think so still. I hope at some proper time the committee authorized to pass upon this question will report a bill to that end.

I think the best organized body of men in the world, certainly in the United States, to do this work is the Army engineers. They have been intrusted with work of this kind for a hundred years, and in all the hundred years of the history of the engineers of the United States Army there has been but one case, I believe, of defalcation. I think that the Army engineers have the ability to do this work more economically and better than any other body of men that could be organized for that purpose. From their long experience they are not only fitted to do the work, but they are the largest employers in the country of civil engineers. In a sense the War Department is organized to take charge of all the sanitary arrangements in Panama. It has engineers to carry out that feature of this work, as well as the building of the canal.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I would not care to discuss this question except for the statement made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] as he was closing, that we had apparently yielded to the contention of the House that another bill, in no wise connected with this measure, had been an evasion of their right to originate revenue bills.

The House sent to us a bill containing some legislation which it was entirely proper for them to incorporate in the bill, if they saw fit. I understand that the House may pass an appropriation bill and send it here containing general legislation. We have a rule that a bill coming from the House shall not be amended by any general legislation here. We also have a provision that certain amendments may be put on, if they are reported from a standing committee. We did what we had a right to do. We struck out the legislative portion of the bill as to bonds and some parts of the bill which might be considered as legislative giving directions as to the expenditure of this money.

Mr. GORMAN. They were limitations.

Mr. TELLER. They were but limitations on the bill.

Mr. President, so far as the members of the conference committee on the part of the Senate expressed themselves, they were entirely in accord with the position taken by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. I do not care myself to go into any general discussion except to say that I do want to enter it upon the records of the Senate that we in nowise gave way to that demand; that it was but an assertion of our right to amend the bill, and to amend it as we thought it ought to be amended if it was to pass with that clause in it.

Mr. SPOONER. What I said was that it might seem, in view of the fact that the section was put back into the bill, as if we were yielding, and that I immediately denied. I did not intend to impute that to the members of the conference committee.

Mr. TELLER. I did not consent that the provision as it came from the House should be put back, for the simple reason that the Finance Committee when considering it had not considered the character of the first section as sufficient to accomplish what the House intended to accomplish and what the Senate wanted to accomplish. We left the question open as to whether that was an invasion of the right of the House.

I confess, Mr. President, that I should not, under the circumstances, have been willing to consent to any change of the Senate rule on amendments—that is, in striking it out. I should have insisted that it should remain out but for the fact that the House members were insistent that it should go in, and we are at the end of the session before adjournment for the holidays, the executive department demanding of us the passage of this bill, saying they need the money, and I felt we could afford to yield something not in the way of the demand that they made, but on the amendment that we had made.

Mr. President, I listened to the legal argument made by the Senator from Wisconsin, as I always do, with great pleasure. I think it is perfectly unanswerable. There are one or two phases of his address to the Senate that struck me with great force. I must say that it was very refreshing and encouraging to me to hear the Senator from Wisconsin advising the Senate that we must stand by the old theory of government; that we had limitations upon the departments; that the legislative department was to legislate, the executive department was to execute, the judicial department was to determine controversies. I know there are a great many Senators here who believe that doctrine to be true and who are devoted to it. Yet I know in the last few years there has been in every department of the Government apparently a disposition to forget that these are constitutional distinctions and are binding upon us all. There has grown up within a few years a disposition to say, When you want a thing done you must find a way to do it. I recall that within a very short time, in a message from the Executive to Congress, it was suggested that certain things ought to be done, and there was the advice to Congress that Congress must find a way to do it.

Mr. President, our power here is an unquestioned power. There can not be much controversy as to what are our duties and our rights here. The limitations between the legislative and executive are marked in the Constitution, so that any man fit to sit in this Chamber ought to have pretty clear ideas of them. Sometimes we let the pressure that comes from certain places, I think, compel us to surrender our own convictions to that of other people. So I repeat it is refreshing to hear a Senator stand on this floor and urge us to stand by the old traditions of the bodies.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask only one question of the distinguished chairman of the committee. The bill, as it will stand if the conference report is agreed to, enables the Treasury Department, under the direction of the President, to dispose of $135,000,000 of bonds, and the object of the amendment, I understand, is to enable the sale of the bonds to be made at a fair rate.

I observe from the hearing before the Committee on Appropriations that the distinguished officer who has charge of the construction of the canal, the Secretary of War, frankly stated that if these bonds were disposed of the executive branch would have a right to contract for any amount of work to the extent of the whole proceeds of those bonds without any further appropriation by Congress. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if that construction of the Spooner Act has been accepted by his committee?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I think the committee was of the opinion (although I speak only for myself, as the question was not distinctly put to the committee as to their view of the Secretary's statement) that the original Spooner Act provides that the President may contract for the construction of the canal, with a limitation of one hundred and thirty-five million, so that it leaves in doubt, to say the least, the question whether, if the President desired to do so under the original Spooner Act, he could enter into a contract for the construction of the isthmian canal on the plan provided for in that act, if he could find a responsible contractor who would agree to construct the canal for $135,000,000.

But in order that there might be no future dispute on that question and questions arising respecting it, this bill provides safeguards in regard to appropriations and contracts which pro tanto change whatever the original construction might properly be as respects the power to make contracts. So I think whatever——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I desire to ask him if he means by that that the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Rhode Island has been retained by the conference committee? The Senator will remember that the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island prohibited anything from being expended except that which was paid out in accordance with appropriations. Was that amendment retained? The amendments are described only by numbers in the conference report, and consequently we were not able to understand them from the reading of the report at the desk.

Mr. ALLISON. Practically all the amendments of the Senate are retained. The provision offered by the Senator from Rhode Island is retained in the bill as agreed upon by the committee of conference. So I think whatever difficulties or differences may have arisen respecting this important matter in the past, as to what the Spooner law did or did not authorize, it is made reasonably plain in the amendments made by the Senate and in the House bill agreed to by the conference committee that in the future there must be appropriations before contracts can be executed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was agreed to.

PANAMA CANAL BONDS.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that the message from the House of Representatives returning the Senate bill be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives, which was read:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
December 15, 1905.

Resolved, That the bill (S. 1475) to provide that the 2 per cent bonds issued under section 8 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, approved June 28, 1902, shall have the same right and privileges that are accorded by law to other 2 per cent bonds of the United States," in the opinion of this House, as respects the first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution, is an infringement on the privileges of this House, and that the said bill be taken from the Speaker's table and be respectfully returned to the Senate with a message communicating this resolution.

Mr. SPOONER. I move that the message be referred to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to report thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 20, 1905, at 12 o'clock meridian.

W. G. Walker to be postmaster at Odanah, in the county of Ashland and State of Wisconsin.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 19, 1905.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. Brantley, a Member-elect from the Eleventh district of Georgia, appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

SITTINGS OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 108.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary and any subcommittee thereof have leave during the Fifty-ninth Congress to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk has just reported? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INVESTIGATION OF BLACK SANDS ON PACIFIC SLOPE.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which is on the Calendar, and which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to Congress a report on the progress of the investigation of the black sands of the Pacific slope, authority for which was included in that section of the sundry civil act approved March 3, 1905, which provided for the preparation of the report on the mineral resources of the United States, and for his opinion as to whether or not this investigation should be continued.

The SPEAKER. This resolution was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and was reported to the House and is upon the Calendar. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire who reported this resolution?

Mr. BROWN. It was reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining yesterday, but the report is not yet in the folding room.

Mr. PAYNE. Who reported it?

Mr. BROWN. I, myself.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to hear an explanation of what this is.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, I will yield such time as is necessary in order to explain this matter thoroughly to the House to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, this is simply a resolution of inquiry. It calls on the Secretary of the Interior to furnish the House with information relative to certain experiments which have been made during the past summer at a plant erected by the Government to treat the black sands of the country with a view of determining their mineral constituents, and an economical method of the separation of the same. An appropriation was made in the last Congress of $25,000 for the purpose of carrying on these experiments. The immediate necessity of the experiments was due to the very rapid increase in the price of platinum by reason of the cutting off of the platinum supply from eastern Asia during the Japanese-Russian war. The experiments were carried on at Portland, Oreg., and continued until the fund was exhausted. There is a plant of considerable size there, but it is impossible to further continue these experiments owing to exhaustion of the appropriation.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, is it not a fact that the Geological Survey, in a letter addressed to the Senate, has made a complete report of the result of the investigation as far as the investigation has gone?

Mr. MONDELL. It is true that the Secretary of the Interior has sent such a letter to the Senate, but it is also true that that report is not officially before the House, and this resolution is introduced for the purpose of bringing a report before the House officially.

Mr. DALZELL. Isn't there a communication addressed to the House or the Senate by the Secretary of the Interior and published as a document on this subject?

Mr. MONDELL. Not bringing out fully the information asked for in this resolution. The Secretary of the Interior has addressed the Senate on the subject, but there is nothing officially before the House, and it is for the purpose of bringing before the House committees the information desired that this resolution is asked for.

Mr. DALZELL. Well, the information the gentleman desires by this resolution is not embodied in this House document.

Mr. MONDELL. It is not embodied in any House document I know of.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is embodied, however, in the Senate document.

Mr. MONDELL. It is embodied in a communication sent to the Senate in response to a resolution similar to this.

Mr. TAWNEY. Would it not be just as well to have the Senate document printed for the information and use of the House?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the report is rather brief, and I will say to the Members of the House that the resolution was introduced in the House and Senate about the same time. The Senate resolution unfortunately did not ask that information be sent to the Congress, but to the Senate, and therefore the House has not this information officially before it, and this resolution will bring somewhat the same information, I presume, from the Secretary to the Speaker as the Senate resolution brought.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. As I understand, this information called for by this resolution has been sent to the Senate.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. If it is not already printed as a document, it probably will be printed as a document, so that if it is printed by the House as a document it will be a duplication of printing.

Mr. MONDELL. It is not proposed to have this printed as a document, but simply proposed that the Secretary of the Interior shall inform the House in a communication.

Mr. MANN. I say to the gentleman if it comes here it naturally is printed as a document. Now, I suggest to the gentleman if the Committee on Mines and Mining need this information from the Secretary for their benefit they can get it by addressing a letter to the Secretary or Director of the Geological Survey. Every committee of the House gets that information upon request, and here is a proposition to duplicate printing——

Mr. MONDELL. Well, Mr. Speaker, there is no proposition to duplicate printing at all. This communication has not been printed. I do not know that anyone has suggested that it be printed. It is the desire of the people living in many of the Western as well as some of the Eastern States, who have mineral lands which they desire to have tested by the Government, to have this information officially in the hands of the committees of the House. This information will be embodied in a comparatively brief letter, and this resolution will bring it before the House.

Mr. DALZELL. This resolution if passed will give the House information that is not to be had from any other source up to this time.

Mr. MONDELL. That is true, sir, so far as the House is concerned.

Mr. MANN. Has not this information been printed in the Senate?

Mr. MONDELL. I think it has not; I am confident it has not.

Mr. MANN. My understanding is the response of the Director of the Geological Survey has been printed in the Senate.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of the fact.

Mr. MANN. Then would it not be well to let this go over and ascertain that fact?

Mr. MONDELL. But even if it had been printed there is no expense attached to asking the Secretary of the Interior to address a letter to the Speaker on the subject.

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman a question, and that is, if in response to this inquiry a letter would come from the Secretary to the Speaker direct?

Mr. MONDELL. It would.

Mr. PAYNE. And by him of course under the rules it would be referred to some committee and ordered to be printed, so by force of the rules if it comes here it will be printed as a document of the House. Now, is not that correct?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think that necessarily follows.

Mr. PAYNE. That is the invariable course, as I understand, and the same rule obtains in the Senate, so if it went to the Senate it must have been already printed.

Mr. DALZELL. But the gentleman says this calls for information which is not available in any other form.

Mr. PAYNE. But I understood the gentleman also to say this would bring a letter that has already gone to the Senate.

Mr. MONDELL. That is true; the Secretary has addressed the Senate on this subject, but that information is not officially before the House.

Mr. PAYNE. But did not the gentleman state it?

Mr. MONDELL. I stated that a similar resolution had been introduced in the Senate, and in answer to that resolution the Secretary of the Interior had written a letter to the President of the Senate in due and proper form.

Mr. PAYNE. And in answer to this inquiry the same letter in duplicate would come to the House.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I assume that some similar document would come here, and I desired to have it here officially in order that it might be considered by the committee.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will allow me to make a suggestion, I think I can tell him how he can get that letter officially——

Mr. MONDELL. What objection has the gentleman to having the information before the House? Why this sudden spasm of economy?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Wyoming will pardon me, I will say if this precedent be set the House will soon be deluged with resolutions of that sort, because every Department of the Government with a hobby wants to get a report before the House and have it printed as a document. Now, I would suggest to the gentleman how he can get it officially before his committee and before the House without violating the precedents of the House. Let him call upon the Secretary for the information and receive the letter and report it to the House, if the House be entitled to it, and have it printed as a part of the report. That saves the precedent of the House as to getting the information officially before the committee and the House.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for the kind suggestion, but desire to inform him that this violates no precedent of the House whatever; information is often obtained by the House in this way; it is the usual way of obtaining it. This is a small document. It pertains to a subject in which a vast number of people are interested.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. TAWNEY. Have you not seen the Senate document?

Mr. MONDELL. I have seen a copy of the Senate typewritten communication.

Mr. TAWNEY. Doctor Day, of the Geological Survey, called on me a few days ago with a printed report from the Survey on the result of the investigation and tests they have been making at Portland under the appropriation of $25,000 made by the last Congress. Now, that report is full and in detail, covering the percentage of platinum in all of the different samples they have tested, and also covering a full description of the processes that have been employed by the Geological Survey in separating the platinum from the gold. That communication was made to the Senate and has been printed in full and in detail, and inasmuch as the resolution will obtain no further information than that, it seems to me entirely unnecessary to duplicate it.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman that the communication to which he refers, and two other communications which have been printed, do not contain all of the information obtainable relative to this investigation. What we desire is in a concise, compact form; a statement as to what has been accomplished, the general results of this investigation, and, in the opinion of the Secretary, the necessity, in view of the fact that there are 80 tons of material, consisting of some 600 samples from 20 States, piled up at the plant awaiting treatment, of further prosecuting the investigation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS]?

Mr. MONDELL. With pleasure.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman if the Geological Survey has not authority to print geological bulletins, and does not the Director, Mr. Walcott, send them out over the United States all the while, and in view of that fact could not this information be given to the public and the gentleman's committee through one of these geological bulletins?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman listened to the reading of the resolution, he will recall that the resolution asks the Secretary for a statement as to the results of these investigations and the advisability of continuing them.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has he not the right, without any authority of Congress to further authorize him, to print this as a bulletin, instead of coming to Congress, so that the general public can get the information?

Mr. MONDELL. What objection has the gentleman to the House having this information?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Nothing, except that it might duplicate the printing.

Mr. MONDELL. There will be nothing duplicated by this resolution, I think.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think it should be printed, especially the bulletin, to give to the House and the committee the information desired.

Mr. MONDELL. The information asked for in this resolution has never been officially before the House and will not be unless it is obtained in this form through a resolution of this character.

Mr. DALZELL. I want to say to the gentleman that my constituents are very much interested in a continuance of this investigation, and I am, therefore, with him in his desire to get all the information possible. I have here a document, No. 65, printed at this session of this Congress, which contains a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, written in response to a Senate resolution. The gentleman is undoubtedly familiar with the document. Now, is the information that he is seeking something in addition to what is contained in this document? I think if the House were persuaded that what he asks is something that has not already been furnished the House the House would be willing to pass his resolution.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that the information we desire is in addition to the information contained in this document, because the information in this document does not enlighten the House fully and officially on the subject. If the House will bear with me a moment, I will repeat there are a vast number of samples piled up out there at Portland—some 600 different samples from 20 different States. They can not be treated because the appropriation is exhausted. The plant is there ready to be started at any time, and we desire to learn officially from the Secretary as to this condition surrounding the investigation and the necessity of continuing it by reason of the very great good that has already been accomplished and the further good that will be accomplished by the examination of the samples now piled up at the Government plant and such as may be received.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does not the gentleman think that this matter of authorizing the printing of documents ought to go to the Joint Committee on Printing, of which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] is the leading member, because the President has recommended economy in the printing business, and the newspapers last winter said that committee was going to save a million dollars in the printing bills? It looks like if they were going to make any saving they ought to be doing it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, for the present I will have to object.

Mr. MONDELL. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not this a privileged resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the first part of the resolution privileged. The latter part is not privileged; and that destroys the privilege of the whole resolution.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House resolution 42.

The SPEAKER. Pending that, the gentleman from Pennsylvania wants to make a request.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print some remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reference of the bill (H. R. 377) to extend the limits of the port of entry of New Orelans, La., be changed from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was then agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House resolution 42.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I read a few days since a statement in the leading Republican organ of this city, the Evening Times, enumerating the number of bills that had been introduced in this House since the 4th day of December that ignored, or tendered to ignore, the well-established and distinctly reserved rights of the States by invoking Federal control. I was glad, Mr. Chairman, if I recollect correctly, that that staunch eRpublican organ condemned the tendency of the "present times" toward centralization. I accept such a declaration as a gratifying protest. Many of these bills that were enumerated in that statement came from Democrats. I rejoice, Mr. Chairman, that this discussion has presented an occasion for a revival of loyalty and allegiance on this side of this House, as well as on the other side of the Chamber, to the great fundamental doctrines that lie at the foundation of our complex and dual national system of government, both State and Federal. Mr. Chairman, I especially rejoice that such a discussion as we have witnessed here in the past two days precedes the discussion of a subject that surely will be brought to the attention of this Congress at a later day for consideration and action; a question, Mr. Chairman, far more important than the matter of whether insurance is commerce or not; a question that involves not only millions of dollars, but a question that involves the protection of the life and the health of the people—the exclusive control of quarantine by the Federal Government.

It is, Mr. Chairman, unwise and unsafe, in my opinion, for the Congress to permit the inspirations of any unusual event, fact, or development that appeals to or arouses the public mind in a fervid manner to dictate or influence what is intended to be remedial legislation.

This Congress, Mr. Chairman, assembled on the 4th day of December under the shadows of two great recent developments or conditions, one occurring in the northern section of our country and the other occurring in the southern section, which have focused public opinion, and they are to-day weighing and pressing earnestly upon the public mind, demanding Federal control where the Federal Government has never before exercised supreme control. The one, as I have just said, being in the North, and the other in the South. The one is the startling, shameless, aggressive, and grasping demoralization and dishonesty unearthed in the insurance investigation in the city of New York; the other the strong and earnest clamor that comes up from certain sections of the South, following the dreaded and appalling visitation of the epidemic of yellow fever; both demanding or urging Federal control of these two great questions of insurance and health. The highest court of our country has solemnly declared that insurance is not commerce, but that it is a mere instrumentality of commercial exchange—an individual contract. It is not denied by anyone in the hearing of my voice that the protection of health is strictly a police regulation belonging to the State, yet we have it asserted by men of distinction and ability that the Federal Government should take control of these two great questions. Why, Mr. Chairman, the statement of the proposition itself is enough to cause this House of Representatives to pause and think well before we enact any legislation on that line.

In the remarks that I intend to make I shall not undertake to enter into a discussion of the insurance question. That has been ably done, and been of great benefit to our country, and done in a patriotic manner.

If we follow the ordinary course of this House, in my opinion that part of the President's message relating to insurance must necessarily go to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of this House. The claim asserted by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, is an absolute confession that insurance is not commerce, because he says that he is reaching out for it for that great committee in order to use the taxing power of the Government, a power that we know, if exercised to its full extent, can mean and does mean destruction. What kind of a tax could be placed upon the business of insurance? Do we mean to drive it out of existence, as we intended to drive another industry out of existence when we passed the oleomargarine bill and taxed that industry out of existence to help another competitive industry? Nobody intends or desires to do that. The taxing power of the Government should only be used to create revenue. Any other use of it is an abuse.

And in this connection, suppose it is referred to the Judiciary Committee. What would be the result? Stare decisis governs lawyers. They are confronted by the decisions of the highest court of this country that insurance is not commerce, that it is a contract made by individuals, that it is an instrumentality of commercial exchange.

What can you expect from that committee? I know it has to be referred somewhere, because it is not admissible and proper, in the Committee of the Whole, to ask that it be laid on the table. I do not subscribe to the doctrine that I have heard asserted frequently in this discussion, nor do I believe that we can find justification or excuse that, because a matter belonging exclusively to State control has grown and enlarged and become more important, and that the Federal Government, in the superiority of its equipments and facilities, is better prepared to take charge, thereby it becomes the subject of Federal control. If it belongs to the jurisdiction of the States, as one of the local and domestic positive powers of the State, it matters not, in my judgment, how large it grows, how it stretches from the area of one State to another. It still remains the subject of State jurisdiction.

Why, suppose we follow this reasoning to its logical conclusion. It would be but a short time, with the tendencies of these times, that Federal control would absorb the reserved right of States to restrict and punish its criminals by its own local statutes. It would not only do that, but it would absorb the right of the State to protect the peace and the morals of the people. Therefore I say that there is a part of the President's message which I look upon as being unsafe and dangerous.

I dissent from the views of the Chief Executive of our Republic, and do it with great respect and profound regard. It is an argument or a plea for Federal control simply because the insurance business has expanded and grown larger and more powerful. He says, "The great insurance companies afford striking examples of corporations whose business has extended so far beyond the jurisdiction of the State which created them as to preclude strict enforcement of supervision and regulation by the parent State." I propound this question to the members of this committee:

Wherein and how has it changed in its methods and manners so as to invite Federal control? Is it not conducted in the same way now substantially as it was when the first decision of the Supreme Court was made declaring that insurance is not commerce? Are not solicitors sent out for patronage, and when reported back to the parent office policies are issued? It is still an individual contract. No more a matter of interstate commerce than a promissory note I might execute to a citizen of another State. I know that more people take policies of insurance to-day than they did twenty years ago. Why? Because there are a great many more people in this country than there were then. Are we not, Mr. Chairman, establishing a precedent in this House by our legislation by saying that because it goes from one State to another we should abandon the State government control of its fundamental rights, its home rule, and its home rights? It preeminently behooves Congress to check and stay such tendencies. Follow it to its logical conclusion. Follow these expressions of the President of the United States to their logical results, and no man can predict the end.

Mr. Chairman, it is proclaimed abroad throughout the land that we have become a great world power, that we are growing and expanding. If that be true, and it is true, then centralization of the most intense character will soon follow. Ah, Mr. Chairman, I fear that that is too true. But the President goes further in his message with expressions of relief that I cordially indorse:

> Of course the only complete remedy for this condition must be found in an aroused public conscience, a higher sense of ethical conduct in the community at large, and especially among business men and in the great profession of the law, and in the growth of a spirit which condemns all dishonesty, whether in rich man or in poor man, whether it takes the shape of bribery or of blackmail.

The fact is that the States have had no opportunity to show what they can do. I do not think any State in the Union would be remiss or derelict in meting out punishment to men who dishonestly and flagrantly, for political purposes and otherwise, criminally use the funds committed to their hands for unlawful purposes in utter disregard of their fiduciary obligations. I think that the State courts would be just as efficient to discharge these duties as a Federal court.

Again, is it possible that anyone could contend fairly that that quickened conscience that will impel the sternest action can not be found to exist among the citizens of a State? I believe that all laws that are made that are not upheld by public sentiment are the most likely to be laxly executed; that developments that are made in New York in the investigation of insurance has aroused the quickened public conscience of the people of the States, and that the State will administer just as effectually and thoroughly as the Federal Government would administer a penal statute prohibiting such crimes. I say this without one single sentiment of hostility to Federal control in its legitimate sphere. I believe in the old democratic doctrine—I mean the democratic doctrine that is the life and spirit of our Republic—that the nearer you get to the great body of the masses of the people the nearer you represent their true sentiment, their loyalty and affection, their individual liberties, and carry out the true principles of our republican form of Government. [Applause.]

Why, then, should we calculate that the Supreme Court, after having discharged its plain duty under the Constitution and declared insurance not to be commerce, etc.—why should we declare that the Supreme Court will change its decision? I know that the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] has said that sometimes supreme courts, both State and Federal, change their opinions. Where have they changed it on a great fundamental principle that lies at the very foundation of our Republic in the matter of the undenied control of the States over all matters of personal contract? Let anyone point to an instance. There are cases where State supreme courts and Federal Supreme Courts have changed their opinions. In that connection, following out his characteristic frankness and honesty, I see that Hon. Alton B. Parker has changed his opinion about a matter wherein he gave his opinion in connection with the ballots in New York. That was honest and fair. And that reminds me, when we look back and see the factors that led up to the development of these great wrongs, this aggressive dishonesty that is described so powerfully in the President's message, who was it that first called public attention to the enormities being perpetrated by corporations in the unlawful use of their funds? It was a charge made by Judge Parker during the Presidential campaign of last year. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He charged that there was rottenness, that there were improper contributions being made from trust funds of corporations for the purpose of carrying on a political campaign. Who says to-day that what he declared has not been overwhelmingly established as the truth? I say, who says it? No one dare rise up and say that the charge that Judge Parker made has not been fully verified and established, and that he has been vindicated, and that he stands proudly as one of the bold, brave, honest citizens of our Republic.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the President still goes further:

In my last annual message I recommended that the Congress carefully consider whether the power of the Bureau of Corporations can not constitutionally be extended to cover interstate transactions and insurance.

Mr. Chairman, that reminds me of a very important matter of legislation that occurred February 10, 1903. Many of you will remember in the creation of the Department of Commerce and Labor it was insisted, for the purpose of controlling trusts and combinations, that a particular feature for publicity be ingrafted on that bill. It was my honor to serve on the conference committee with the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], with Senator Hanna, Senator NELSON, and Senator CLAY. That question came up about what was known as the "Nelson substitute." What was the Nelson substitute? And in that connection I say that it was my pleasure to come here on the floor of this House and dissent to the report of that conference committee on that "publicity" feature. In that connection I used this language on the 10th day of February, 1903:

Now, Mr. Speaker, I dissent most earnestly and sincerely from this Nelson substitute. I believe it to be an ultra dilution of a hypodermic injection of so-called "antitrust legislation." I believe it to be a travesty upon what its friends represent and claim to be its only virtue—publicity.

It is well that we can look at things dispassionately. It was claimed that that was all of the antitrust legislation that was needed to regulate these great combines and trusts at that time—vociferously claimed and earnestly argued. True, I put my humble protest in against it, but I desire to test the declarations of the gentlemen who advocated it and so earnestly supported that "Nelson substitute" as to the fruits and results of it nearly three years afterwards. What was that substitute?

The said Commissioner shall have power and authority to make, under the direction and control of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, diligent investigation into the organization, conduct, and management of the business of any corporation, joint stock company, or corporate combine engaged in commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, excepting common carriers, and gather such information and data as will enable the President of the United States to make recommendations to Congress for legislation for the regulation of such commerce, and to report such data to the President from time to time as he shall require, and the information so obtained, or as much thereof as the President may direct, shall be made public.

I pause and ask, What information on the subject of unlawful and oppressive combines and trusts has ever been conveyed to the President of the United States during the three past years by the Commissioner of Corporations of the Department of Commerce and Labor? Has anyone heard of the use of his powers by the Commissioner under that publicity law? The power was given in that substitute, the Nelson substitute, for the President to call for facts and information and hold in his hand just such part of it as he saw fit, and give to the public the balance. Have any facts furnished the President by the Commissioner been given to the public?

I put it to any Republican on the other side of this Chamber or elsewhere, point me to a single instance where that investigation or collection of facts has been made by the Commissioner of Corporations in that Department. The power was in his hands. The mighty Standard Oil Company, the steel trust, and all other kindred combinations were there, and what has he done? And yet the President in his message recommends that we shall confer still greater power upon the Bureau of Corporations, in charge now of the same Commissioner. Is there anything to encourage me or you or anyone else to give further power to that Bureau for the investigation of trusts and combinations? None whatever. The Nelson substitute—the publicity law—has been a dead law, a failure, not because it had no field to operate in; the game was abundant. Permit me now, Mr. Chairman, to present another subject occupying a more delicate and sensitive relation to the reserved rights of the States than insurance. I, of course, refer to quarantine.

In the trail or wake of the appalling and dreadful epidemic of yellow fever in the South there is a great clamor made for Federal control. No man could take his stand on the floor of this House who is more eager and anxious to forever banish that dreaded disease and plague from the shores of the South than am I; but rather than sacrifice one of the fundamental rights of my State, or its domestic and local control of one of its reserved powers, I would be willing to fight the yellow fever for ages to come. We are encouraged to believe that under the advance of science it will not be long before we will be free from this scourge. Many public men express the opinion that we want Federal control. They do not stop to consider the far-reaching effects of such a proposition.

The position that I take is that I concede that there is no violation of the reserved rights of the States in this proposition; that the Federal Government controls quarantine so as to prevent the importation of disease from foreign countries or the spread of disease from one State to the other. By so doing the Government is but exercising its constitutional function. That, Mr. Chairman, the Government is doing to-day, and I contend that under the present law the Government has clothed the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service with all the authority and power that Congress is authorized under the Constitution to give. But the other proposition is, and the real question is, can a Federal quarantine law, giving Federal health authorities supreme control, be framed within constitutional limits and not interfere with the positive reserve rights of the States? That is the main question. When I remember that Federal jurisdiction of quarantine is exercised primarily in the interest of commerce and that State jurisdiction is exercised primarily for the protection of life and health in different communities and secondarily in the interest of commerce, then I dissent from this proposition. Now, if any gentleman will take the trouble to investigate Federal legislation on quarantine he will find that every act of Congress up to 1900 on the subject of quarantine was in aid of the enforcement of State laws. I do not contend that if the Government can lawfully and rightfully exercise a certain constitutional function the mere failure to do that abnegates or causes the Government to abandon it. Let us look at the law.

The first law we have on the subject is "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases from one State to another, and for the punishment of certain offenses," approved on the 27th day of March, 1890. What more authority can the Government give to the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service than to give the control of interstate quarantine? The next law, Mr. Chairman, on this subject is "An act granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service," which is now known as the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service. This act requires the Surgeon-General and even the President of the United States to maintain officers at foreign ports, medical or otherwise, or consuls, and not to let any vessel leave that port until it comes with a "bill of health." That is control of foreign quarantine in its supremest manner. Why, some gentleman said to me: "The Government has no right, it is extrajudicial to assert a power or to make a law that is to operate in a foreign port." I admit that is true. The Secretary of the Treasury by this law is required to formulate rules and regulations for the inspection of those vessels, and the answer that I make is that if those vessels do not allow that inspection to take place and to receive that bill of health, why we certainly have control over this side of the waters and we can prevent them from coming into our ports and landing unless they comply with our requirements. That is the answer to it. There is the legislation giving Federal control, in which I agree and believe, and I say right here that if the Federal Government had the control, with the consent of the States, of the maritime stations that the States control that it would be better for us and better for all concerned, and before I conclude I wish to point out what I conceive to be the way that can be done. Now, that is the legislation of the past. Let us look now and see the legislation that took place in 1902, and it happened to be my pleasure to have charge of the bill that came from the Senate to the floor of the House, and that bill did this. The important section of it was section 7, which reads:

That when in the opinion of the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service of the United States the interests of the public health would be promoted by a conference of said service with State or Territorial boards of health, quarantine authorities, or State health officers, the District of Columbia included, he may invite as many of said health and quarantine authorities as he deems necessary or proper to send delegates, not more than one from each State or Territory and District of Columbia, to said conference: Provided, That an annual conference of the health authorities of all the States and Territories, and the District of Columbia to be entitled to one delegate: Territories and the District of Columbia to be entitled to one delegate: And provided further, That it shall be the duty of the said Surgeon-General to call a conference upon the application of not less than five State or Territorial boards of health, quarantine authorities, or State health officers, each of said boards or quarantine authorities joining in such request to be represented by one delegate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will read the opinion from a distinguished Republican, giving his views on the subject of that section I have just read. The subject was carefully considered for days and days trying to get at what was right, what the jurisdiction of State and Federal quarantine was. Senator SPOONER, in the report which he made on this bill, says:

This section we regard as by all means the most important section in the bill. The dividing line between the Federal power of quarantine, in its relation to foreign commerce and interstate commerce, and the State power of quarantine and police regulation, in its relation to the public health, is undoubtedly real.

Why, some men think it is a fiction. If you can take charge by the Federal Government of quarantine and matters relating to health, why can you not take charge of diphtheria or measles, or anything in the way of diseases that are contagious or infectious? Why does it not lead to that? He continues:

But it is often very difficult of discernment, and therefore it has often happened that State authorities have felt their province invaded by Federal authorities, and Federal authorities have insisted that the national function was invaded by State authorities, and out of it all has grown more or less of friction, necessarily detrimental to great public interests. No statute, of course, can change the power of the Federal authorities as defined by the Constitution, or take away the sovereign power of any State in respect of these matters.

That is all I am contending for to-day. I know that our people are aroused under the terrible visitation of yellow fever, and by the memory of that which occurred in 1879, in which 15,000 people lost their lives, with a monetary loss of more than a million dollars, which is calculated to lead us from the stanch mooring of what is right between the authorities of the States and the Government. Why, Doctor Wyman—and I say in this connection that I will be glad to see the Bureau of Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service made a separate department, but not with a secretary in the Cabinet; in my judgment it ought not to be controlled by the Treasury Department, for there is no compatibility, but make it a separate department—Doctor Wyman administers the laws of the Government with all delicacy, with great ability, with consummate skill in all matters of possible friction between the State and the Government, and has given full satisfaction by the manner in which he has administered them.

Senator SPOONER further said:

The committee has been impressed with the conviction that in the general public interest some recognition by Federal legislation of the State health authorities, in the way of consultation upon subjects of vital consequence to the localities, and as to the rules to be put in operation by both State and Federal authorities in accomplishing the same end, would of necessity bring about better understanding and a cooperation which would inevitably promote a fuller accomplishment of the great purpose desired by both the Federal and the State authorities.

He further predicted that the best of results would follow the law, because—

First. That when, in the opinion of the Surgeon-General, the interests of the public health would be promoted by a conference of that service with the State or Territorial health officers he may invite as many of said health officers and quarantine authorities as he deems necessary to send delegates, not more than one from each State or Territory and District of Columbia, to such a conference.

Second. That an annual conference of the health authorities of the States and Territories and District of Columbia shall be called by the Surgeon-General, each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia to be entitled to one delegate.

Third. That it shall be the duty of the Surgeon-General to call a conference upon the application of not less than five State or Territorial boards of health, quarantine authorities, or State health officers, each of said boards or quarantine authorities joining in such request to be represented by one delegate.

I take this occasion to read the well-established and accepted judicial view. I know that the Supreme Court of the United States, in a decision rendered by Judge Miller, shadows, or indicated, some different doctrine than this, but Judge Grier in a certain case said:

It has been frequently decided by this court that the powers which relate to the merely municipal regulations, or what may be more properly called "internal police," are not surrendered by the States or restrained by the Constitution of the United States, and that, consequently, in relation to these the authority of a State is complete, unqualified, and conclusive. Without attempting to define what are the peculiar subjects or limits of this power, it may safely be affirmed that every law for the restraint and punishment of crime, for the preservation of the public peace, health, and morals must come within this category.

As subjects of legislation, they are from their very nature of primary importance. They lie at the foundation of social existence; they are for the protection of life and liberty, and necessarily compel all laws on subjects of secondary importance, which relate only to property, convenience, or luxury, to recede when they come in conflict or collision. Salus populi suprema lex.

That is the fundamental doctrine. Mr. Chairman, I am repeating a great deal of the well-established doctrine as declared by our Supreme Court. I am repeating it simply for the reason that I believe that there is a strong and intelligent view and feeling prevailing in many sections of the South upon the advisability of supreme Federal control of quarantine. We have had it said over and over again to us by the northern people and by the Republican Representatives on this floor that they are willing to abide by whatever law the southern Representatives and the Southern States are of opinion will protect them from a visitation of yellow fever again. We are grateful for that generous sentiment. We appreciate it. As a southern man I do not invite them to give their sanction or their vote, and they would not do it if I did, to any proposition that ignored a fundamental, domestic, local right of a State. Why, Mr. Chairman, no people on earth could have been more grateful to the President of the United States for the absolute and unqualified courage and profound and earnest sympathy that welled up in his heart for our stricken people, that he manifested when he visited New Orleans. It was accepted with profound gratitude. The office of the President of the United States was forgotten in the appreciation and the esteem that they accorded the man.

But let us see for a moment what Doctor Wyman says about this matter. Listen to him talking about the law of 1902:

The conferences called for by this act are very valuable in preventing the spread of epidemic diseases by insuring cooperation of State authorities with the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service. Matters of sanitary interest, ventilation, housing, disposal of garbage, etc., and matters relating to prevention of epidemic diseases are considered by special committees appointed by the Surgeon-General for that purpose.

The State health authorities are thus brought into close relationship with the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service. The municipal health officers, through their dealings with the State board of health, form a part of the system. The result is an interchange of views of mutual understanding between all health authorities, and the closer relations thus established will be of great benefit in the public-health work of the future.

I think there ought to be an amendment to that law to the effect that every chairman of a board of health, or other designated State health officer, ought to be ex officio a member of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service. Doctor Wyman, I am certain, has recommended the same. Let them sit down at the same board and confer with each other, and in that conference agree upon rules of uniformity that will prevent many of the useless restrictions on travel and embargoes that were placed upon commerce and avoid serious inconvenience to people that occurred so frequently in the Southern States during the reign of the epidemic. Why, it went up as far north as Cairo, Ill. We suffered immensely in the derangement of our business matters, and consequently great loss of money. All we need is for the State to consent that this board of health, its president of the board of health, or any health quarantine officer be allowed to sit around the Federal board.

I would be glad to see a National Federal Board of Health with the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service at the head of it, so that they would have conferences and would adopt rules that would prevail at all ports and in the States. As it is now, the Federal Government, while it exercises interstate quarantine, can start a train from New Orleans to Louisville, going through two or three States, and not a man on that train, under the rules and regulations as administered by the State, can get off in Alabama or Tennessee unless he complies with the regulations prescribed by the State. I would be glad to see it so that when a man complied with the rules and requirements, detentions, isolations, and so forth, that are necessary to pronounce him free from infectious disease and bears a certificate that he should have the right to leave that train at any point in Alabama or Tennessee by presenting his certificate and go on rejoicing. That is the rule I want. That can never be accomplished except by the consent of the State through the action of its legislature.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman think now that a Federal statute could bring that about? I am very much interested in what the gentleman has been saying.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The present statute brings that about.

Mr. GARRETT. Then it makes it possible to permit one to get off in violation of the local regulations? That is the point at which I am driving.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; the present statute does not do it, and it could not be done except with the consent of Alabama and Tennessee. It is impossible for it to be done.

Mr. GARRETT. And the Federal Government can not enact a statute which would permit it?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No, sir; it could not enact a statute to permit that man, against the quarantine regulations of Alabama, to get off. He would probably have to go to Canada if the State of Kentucky objected to the same thing, because that would be making, my dear sir, the Federal Government supreme and exclusive on the question of quarantine in the limits of a State.

Mr. GARRETT. I concur with the gentleman entirely. Just one thought further, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. Assuming, now, for a moment that that can be done, that the Federal Government can enact a statute which would force upon a community the reception of an individual traveler through the State that desired to stop at that particular station, despite the local quarantine regulation, and assuming that the Federal Government should pass an act undertaking to provide that he might do that, would not this also be true, that after he had gotten off the train and had ceased to be an interstate passenger he would immediately become subject to the police regulations of the State?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. How could he get off the train if the State has a guard there to meet every train? Now, let me read to my worthy friend from Tennessee a short paragraph.

Mr. GARRETT. I was assuming that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama (reading)—

Suppose a citizen or an alien, no matter whom, the President of the United States or the humblest individual that ever entered the harbor, to approach our city, bringing infection, bearing death to thousands—an approach more dreadful than that of an invading army. He is repelled, justly repelled, by the express authority of the law of nations. By whom is he repelled? By the Federal Government? Under what clause of the Constitution? Under which of its powers? Under its commercial power? A traffic in contagion! A tariff on disease! Under its war power? A war with the king of terrors! No; the State, and the State alone, has the power, and alone is charged with the duty of repelling disease and of guarding its confines from the entrance of whatever might injure its citizens.

Mr. Chairman, I must confess that it is no surprise to me that conservative, patriotic citizens from all sections of the Union, who love with honesty and sincerity and desire to preserve the principles of our Government, are becoming anxious and uneasy when they hear that the Federal Government is solicited by respectable, good, and intelligent citizens to take charge of contracts and health within the limits of the States.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, and will yield it to the gentleman from Virginia. I also ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia does not appear to be present. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, that there is great diversity of opinion in this House in reference to this subject of insurance dealt with in the President's message is apparent. The discussion so far has to my mind been very instructive and beneficial. It is very important to take the right step at this time with reference to this portion of the message, because the proper action at this time will have an influence upon the action that is likely to follow. The gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, has contended that insurance, not being commerce, should not be referred to the Comittee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; that the subject can be reached and regulated by means of the exercise of the taxing power. It seems to me that his position is unanswerable. On the other hand, the gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, contends that notwithstanding the fact that the highest court has decided that insurance is no commerce, yet that there is a possibility that the court may reverse itself upon that question in view of the assertion on the part of Congress of authority over the subject. This same view seems to be expressed by the Commissioner of Corporations in his report. He says:

Seemingly the most effective way to settle the question is for Congress to so legislate upon the subject as to afford an opportunity to present to the Supreme Court the question whether insurance as now conducted is interstate commerce, and hence subject to Federal regulation.

There is a distinction between control under the commerce clause of the Constitution and attempted regulation by reason of the power of taxation, as suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], or by reason of the regulation that would result from control of the mails, as suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS]. If the Supreme Court should be induced to reverse its decision and hold that insurance is commerce, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, then the authority of Congress over that subject would be exclusive of all other authority and would ipso facto destroy all State regulation authority and control over the subject. On the other hand, if you exercise authority by means of the taxing power or any similar power, it would be simply supplemental to State authority and State control, and such regulation and control would not be interfered with. It would be analogous to the matter of the traffic in intoxicating liquors, where the Federal authority simply supplements and aids the power of the State and municipality. By means of the taxing power the Federal Government supplements and helps the government of the State and municipality with that subject.

I was very much impressed by the argument of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] in regard to the quarantine matter, in which it was argued that the authority of the Federal Government can be made to work in conjunction with the State authorities, and so, instead of being in conflict, the two would work together with more effectiveness than the one. I beg to congratulate gentlemen of the minority upon this floor on their argument against undue centralization of power in the Federal Government. I believe it is wise to retain as much power in the local and State governments as is consistent with the due and proper exercise of the authority of the General Government. I believe almost to the full extent that they do in the preservation of State authority, and I am as much against undue and unnecessary centralization of power in the Federal Government as they possibly can be. Now, what would be the result if Congress should enact a law asserting control over the subject of insurance as interstate commerce and such an act should be upheld by the Supreme Court? It is not life insurance alone that is referred to. It is fire insurance, marine insurance, casualty insurance, fidelity insurance, and all kinds of insurance contracts. This subject is already regulated in nearly every State, if not every State in the Union. In the State of Minnesota, for more than a generation, we have built up a code of laws on the subject of insurance, which laws, we think, are wise and beneficial. We make it a condition precedent to the entry of any foreign corporation into that State for the purpose of engaging in insurance that they must comply with the regulations that we prescribe. They must pay a fee. They must pay a 2 per cent tax upon all premiums paid in. The tax on fire-insurance premiums goes to the support and the relief of sick, injured, or disabled firemen, and their widows and orphans.

The State of Minnesota in 1903 collected $242,350 from insurance companies foreign to the State, in 1904 more than a quarter of a million, and this year approximately three hundred thousand, and a large share of this is used for the support of disabled firemen in the various municipalities, being divided according to the amount of premiums paid by particular localities. We do not want these laws destroyed or impaired.

Now, if you should succeed in inducing the Supreme Court of the United States to reverse itself on this question, and to say that Congress has the power under the commerce clause to regulate insurance of all kinds, you would deprive the State of its authority and destroy all of those statutes that we have on our books, and I venture to say that they are the result of long experience and that they are wise laws. They have safely guarded the rights of the policy holders of the State in the past. We are satisfied with them. We can amend them whenever our people so desire. We desire to retain both the control of and the revenue from insurance in the State.

Who have asked for their destruction? Not the people of Minnesota; not the policy holders of the State; not the brave and heroic firemen who have been injured in the line of duty, nor their widows and orphans. No; on the contrary, these have protested and are protesting against such legislation. Neither have I heard of the people of any other State asking for such a measure. The demand does not come from the people, but rather from the managers of insurance interests who feel impatient under State regulation and control. Why, the first bill introduced in the Fifty-eighth Congress placing insurance under Federal authority and control was introduced by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN], who is and was the president of the Prudential Life Insurance Company, one of the largest in the country. The dishonesty in life insurance management disclosed by the investigation in New York, however deep and disgraceful, has not shown that the solvency of any of the companies concerned was affected.

To the location of these companies with their enormous accumulations of funds in the financial center of the country, where speculation and gambling on the exchanges is constantly going on, is largely due the fall of these men. These causes are local to the city of New York.

It may be claimed and it is claimed that Federal control is superior to State control. I myself went on the stump a few years ago and argued that if we created the Department of Commerce and Labor it would be a regular "trust buster;" that it would do wonders in the land in regard to monopoly; but it has not reached our expectations. Federal control in itself has never shown itself to be superior to State control in its proper field. [Applause.] Look at the banks. Is the supervision of the Federal Government over national banks superior to the supervision of the State banks by the State authorities? Are there not failures of national banks all over the land and depositors swindled just as much as the State banks? Look, for instance, at the supervision that ought to be exercised over interstate transportation. Have not the railroad companies ever since the interstate-commerce law was passed in 1887 been violating the law every day? [Applause.] Have we not created the machinery whereby the act should be enforced, and yet do we not find them unable to enforce it? And although the Department of Justice claims to have been very busy, has not that Department failed to land the rebaters and discriminators in the penitentiary so far?

How to make these laws of Congress more effective, how to make our regulation regulate is the problem constantly before us. It is the question of the hour. We hope to make our laws in regulation of interstate commerce, as well as for the suppression of monopolies and trusts, so that they will at least, as a rule, be obeyed; but we have not yet succeeded. Let us not invade the jurisdiction of the States in such a manner as to destroy or impair it.

Compare the State control of transportation within the States with Federal control over interstate transportation. Which is the most complete and effective? I favor control by the Federal Government of matters within its proper sphere, but I do not want to see it supersede State control where that is practicable. The Federal authorities just now seem to have a great desire to supervise, but so far we have not had very efficient supervision in that field. Why, the very disclosures that have been made in the State of New York are the result of an investigation set on foot by the State machinery, as has been well stated here; and if that investigation were to be carried a little further I believe we would find national banks, under Government supervision, using the public money unlawfully in the financial operations and speculations carried on to enrich the men in control.

I do not believe that the Supreme Court will ever reverse its decision that insurance is not commerce, and I would be opposed to asking the court to reverse itself. I am glad it decided as it did. If we leave well enough alone, then when Federal control is desired we can exercise it by virtue of the taxing power, and that kind of Federal control will be supplemental to State control and not destructive of it or exclusive of it. I am therefore opposed to referring this matter to the Commerce Committee. I am willing to take, and I think this House ought to take, the decisions of the Supreme Court as conclusive. Insurance is not commerce, and this question should not be referred to the Commerce Committee. Should it be referred to the Ways and Means Committee? That is another question. It seems to me that before we decide that question we ought to have the opinion of the Committee on the Judiciary as to whether or not regulation by means of the taxing power is proper, or whether it is analogous from a legal point of view to the taxing of oleomargarine, mixed flour, and all these other subjects that have been reached in that way, or whether it would be practicable and lawful within the power of Congress to exercise control by means of our control over post-offices and post-roads under the Constitution or by means of any other authority that the Federal Government may possess.

When we have learned the opinion of these eminent gentlemen who compose that committee, I believe that we will be aided in a proper solution of this problem. I know it is claimed that we are most of us lawyers and can investigate for ourselves, but we have not all the time to determine this question and give to it such thought and attention as ought to be devoted to it. I believe that the Committee on Judiciary have the time and that they will render us valuable service in the solution of this question. As I have said, I am willing there should be Federal control over insurance, provided it will not destroy State supervision and control. Federal control or regulation under the commerce clause would be exclusive and would destroy all State authority over the subject, but Federal regulation by means of the taxing power would not. The two could work in harmony and supplement each other.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota three minutes more.

Mr. STEENERSON. Now, it is claimed in the message that the inability of the State to regulate effectively insurance companies of other States doing business in such State is clear. I deny it. Experience has proven the contrary. The power over foreign has been just as effective as the power over domestic corporations.

In the power to exclude a foreign corporation from doing business within its limits a State possesses a most effective means of regulation. If the corporation does not comply with State requirements, it is excluded and can do no business therein. It would seem to me to be a reflection upon the people of the different States to say that with such absolutely effective weapon in their hands they can not control these matters better than can be done for them by a bureau here in Washington. Anyone familiar with the peculiar form of bureaucracy we have here will not be inspired by any great confidence in its superiority to regulate insurance.

No corporation foreign to a State has any absolute or vested right to enter or do business therein.

Its admission to the State is a matter of comity only. Whenever a foreign insurance corporation does not now, in the opinion of the State authorities, treat its customers or policy holders right, or there is a question as to the fairness of its methods or its solvency, it is excluded. Its license is revoked, and the funds deposited to secure existing contracts in the State are retained. In this matter of foreign insurance, the several States are amply able to take care of themselves now, and much better off than if foreign insurance companies could be forced upon them, as they could be were insurance adjudged to be commerce. I believe the people of the several States know what they are about, and the fact that no demand comes from them, but rather from the insurance interests, is significant. If it is desired to have action on the part of Congress on this insurance matter, let us proceed on the theory that what the highest court in the land has decided to be law is the law; let us exercise the taxing power or our power over the postal service with a view to such a control by Federal authority as will supplement and aid, but not destroy, the authority of the several States in the premises.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] will prevail, and the whole matter be referred to the Judiciary Committee, with instructions. [Applause.]

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, it was with a great deal of interest, and profit as well, that I, among the new Members of the House of Representatives, have listened to the various arguments which have been presented by the Members before this Committee of the Whole on the question of referring the various phases in the President's message to the different committees to which it should properly go. On yesterday we heard oration, profound, inspiring, and prophetic, upon the injustice, inhumanity, and barbarity perpetrated on the Jews in Russia. These atrocities perpetrated on the Jews appeal to the refinement and the humanitarian sentiments of every human being. No doubt the President of the United States would approve any action taken by the House of Representatives toward authorizing him to express his sympathy with these mistreated human beings. He has already shown his humanitarian sentiments, his profound sympathy between the warring nations of Russia and Japan, and has well shown that he is entitled to the place which is ascribed to the peacemaker, of whom it is said: "Blessed is the peacemaker."

We also listened on yesterday afternoon to quite a dissertation on the wrongs perpetrated in the Naval Academy at Annapolis, in what is known as "hazing." Being from the State of Louisiana, from which State young Meriwether comes, I feel that it is proper at this time for me to state, in the absence at this moment of the other Members from Louisiana, that the Secretary of the Navy has found, upon examination of the facts in that case, that Meriwether was not guilty of hazing, because, under the act of Congress, should he have been guilty of hazing he would have been expelled from the Naval Academy. Neither do we find, upon that examination, as it has been claimed by some Members on the floor, that he was guilty of even assault and battery, much less manslaughter. But the Secretary has found that he was guilty of violating some of the rules and regulations of the academy, and for that reason a penalty has been assessed, apparently light in its form. There are good reasons why no heavier penalty should have been assessed in that particular case. A man may repel force by force, using sufficient force to overcome the attack with which he is opposed, and Meriwether being forced into the encounter which resulted in the unfortunate death of young Branch, simply repelled that force which was thrust upon him and by which he was opposed.

Unfortunate though it be, still it was one of those incidents which might happen in the life of anyone in defending his honor and in standing up for the rights which are given him by nature—the right of self-defense. But, passing from that to the immediate question which is now before the Committee of the Whole, as I understand it, it is whether or not that portion of the President's message which refers to an investigation and supervision of the insurance companies shall be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or whether it should be referred to some other committee of the House. Now, it may be that being a new Member, and, as was denominated by the leader on this side of the House on the first day of the session, one of the kids, it would be more appropriate that nothing should be said by one of them on this occasion, but we all know that it is the nature of a kid to butt in. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the leader of this side of the House gave an illustration only a few days ago to show why it is best on some occasions that the mouths of Members should not open. But if we are to be consigned to the tomb or denominated likenesses of corpses because we remain silent, I prefer, at least, to open my mouth upon this occasion. It is said that a few years ago, before the manufacturing enterprises had attained the magnitude to which they have now come in the State of Alabama, where there was an abundance of coal and of iron and of limestone with which to flux the metal and an abundance of forests, on one occasion an enterprising man from the North attended a funeral. He was inquisitive to know from what section of the country the beautiful horses came which were drawing the hearse to the grave. He was told the horses came from Kentucky, that the harness came from Cincinnati, that the hearse came from Chicago, that the coffin came from Pittsburg, and that the case in which the metallic casket was contained came from Maine. He was struck with astonishment that with all the facilities for making iron and steel and leather and wooden material none of these materials should come from the State of Alabama. Expressing his astonishment he asked, What is it that the people of Alabama contribute on this occasion? He was answered that they contributed the corpse and the hole in the ground. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that unless we on this side of the House succeed better in agreeing upon the various propositions which have been discussed we may also be called upon to contribute in the future the corpse and the hole in the ground, or we may be in the position that the young lady was placed in when she was not prepared to see the young gentleman who was visiting her. She sent down word by the green servant girl that at present she could not come in; that she was negligee. The servant did not correctly pronounce the expression which she had gotten from her mistress, and I am afraid that if we do not try to agree upon the various propositions that have been presented, when we go back to give an account of our stewardship we will find ourselves as "naked as a jay." [Laughter and applause.]

The President says in his message, under the head of insurance:

> Recent events have emphasized the importance of an early and exhaustive consideration of this subject to see whether it is not possible to furnish better safeguards than the several States have been able to furnish against corruption of the flagrant kind which has been exposed.
> I repeat my previous recommendation that the Congress should also consider whether the Federal Government has any power or owes any duty with respect to domestic transactions in insurance of an interstate character. That State supervision has proved inadequate is generally conceded.

Mr. Chairman, in presenting that feature of the question before this committee I wish to say that the President has in his message shown that he possesses the convictions of a Bryan, the firmness of an Andrew Jackson, the popularity which he will obtain through the medium of this instrument as great as that of Witte among the Russian people, and he has shown by his position on the various measures which he has taken in this message to have the patriotism of the Japanese. I say this in spite of the fact that there are many questions upon which we have widely differed from the President, and we believe have had just cause for finding serious fault, but the position which he has taken on these public questions now before the country draws him nearer and nearer to the Democratic heart, and we may well allow the dead past to bury its dead. There are various ways under the Constitution of the United States in which the question of regulating insurance companies may be followed. Any one of them would be adequate, in my humble opinion. None of them violates either the letter or the spirit of the Constitution of the United States. I say this with due deference and with all deference to the learned and able leaders on this side of the House, and by it I do not wish to be understood as taking the position that the Federal authorities should supervene or should take the place of the control which the States now have of the various insurance companies.

As suggested, insurance may be regulated by the levying of taxes. Under that article of the Constitution which provides for establishing uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy. It may be regulated under that provision which reserves to Congress the right to make laws for the District of Columbia, and if it had not been that the Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly held that insurance is not commerce it might have been regulated under that clause, but if it should, as expressed by the gentleman who has just preceded me, I would not be willing for it to be regulated through that channel, because of the fact that it would in all probability supersede the supervision which the States now have over insurance. There is no principle of democracy more thoroughly embedded in my nature than that the rights of the various States should be reserved to them and that these rights should remain forever in the States. Under the head of levying taxes, without going into detail, it is perfectly apparent that with twelve billions of insurance policies outstanding it would be proper that a vast amount of that kind should be controlled by some power, that it would be proper that some strong arm intervened between the weak arm of the State and these strong insurance companies. The mind of man can not conceive of an amount so vast, so stupendous as $12,000,000,000, to be controlled in one form and another by these insurance companies, either with or without supervision. The acts of wrong which they have already perpetrated upon widows and orphans and upon those holding insurance policies for the benefit of themselves and their creditors go to show that they can not be left alone to do their own will in their own way. If it should fall under the head of bankruptcy, under which it could properly fall, it could easily be held or a statute could be enacted by which it could be determined that they should submit to the inspection of the proper committee and tribunal or a bureau whenever the facts justified an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not their outstanding obligations exceeded their assets, and construing these twelve billions distributed among the several companies, a billion or a billion and a quarter in any one company of outstanding insurance, whether or not that was a liability which could be counted against them in declaring them to be insolvent in cases where fraud is charged, and the prima facie showing is that fraud has been perpetrated, either in contributing to national campaign funds, in paying outrageous and unreasonable salaries, a hundred thousand dollars and a hundred and fifty thousand dollars, to the presidents of their companies, and other acts which have been shown by the investigation carried on recently in the State of New York and other places. But it is contended that the supervision by the United States of insurance companies would contravene the right inherent in them and reserved to them by the Constitution of the United States.

Why, Mr. Chairman, we see that the Constitution allows us to keep and bear arms; still the various States of the Union are permitted, in the construction of that clause in the Constitution, to regulate the manner in which arms shall be kept and shall be worn, and as to whether citizens shall be allowed to carry them concealed or whether they shall be allowed to carry them of a certain size, etc. We find also that the national Interstate Commerce Commission is vested with the power to discriminate and determine certain things in reference to interstate traffic on the railroads; and still nearly every, if not every, State of this Union has a State commission on the same lines, and their interests, their desires, and their duties do not conflict. The sale of intoxicating liquors is regulated by the United States laws, and still we find in every State in the Union that the traffic in intoxicating liquors is regulated by the State authorities. We find the same in reference to the irrigation of the arid lands in the West. We find the same in reference to levees, particularly on the Mississippi River, which are contributed to by the States as well as by the United States Government, and their supervision does not interfere one with the other. We have also been told this morning upon this floor that some Members are opposed to national quarantine regulations. For one I believe that the strong arm of the National Government ought to come to the aid of the State government in the question of quarantine. The point has been reached in the history of infectious and contagious diseases that all the States are not able to control satisfactorily to the other States the question of quarantine, and while I take the position that each State should still have the right in its own way to control its local matters, in the question of quarantine and in all other questions of the kind as well, there should be a supervisory control, and to a certain extent now there is a supervisory control on the part of the United States Government, and there is no conflict so far as my attention has been called. The people of the South are recently aroused on the question as to whether or not we shall obtain at this session of Congress anything in benefit of our public-road system. We are deeply interested in that question. That might be construed in the same way as interfering with States rights and trespassing upon our domain; but I understand that some bills have been presented and will, no doubt, be pressed by those who are favoring them. They will be reported, I hope, but the regulations are to be so arranged that they will not contravene the rights of the States. All of these questions might as well be eliminated by the States, because of the fact that the United States Government is to supervene in behalf of these various matters, as that will deprive them of the right to exercise their local authority.

I contend, Mr. Chairman, that it will not. The wrongs of the insurance company should be remedied. The frauds have been stupendous. The depredation and spoliation and injustice to the people can not longer be tolerated, and, if they are, it is only a question of a short time when the people will be so hampered, so chained, so enslaved, that they can not longer be considered as freemen. We have had an experience of that kind in our own State, where the great lottery company organized there for years and years not only interfered with questions of legislation and hampered but actually controlled for the time being the legislature of the State, until the strong arm of the National Government came in and regulated them to a certain extent by saying that they could not transmit the lottery matter through the United States mails. That was the regulation, and it stopped this evil practice. Where a fraudulent concern, be it lottery company, insurance company, or any other kind of a company, sought to perpetrate any wrong or frauds or injustice on the people, they could be debarred from using the United States mails, and they could be investigated by proper authorities in this connection. There is another thing which this side of the House stands for, and I believe that there is not a Member on this side, with perhaps a few exceptions, but who is in favor of the railroad rates being regulated by some authority, whether the Interstate Commerce Commission or some other. It makes no difference whether it is to be regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission and whether it be a question of commerce or not, the principle is the same. Why do the Members on this side of the House favor the National Government regulating the question of railroad rates, and at the same time object to the regulating of insurance companies? The question of the right of the State, the inherent right of each State to govern its own internal affairs, is the same in the one case as it is in the other. I believe that the great law committee, the Judiciary, should handle this question. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have taken the authority of saying something with reference to what a new Member has observed after a short stay in the capital. I do believe that the feeling, the inspiration, of patriotism is implanted in the hearts of every Member of this national body. We are here to make the laws for the whole United States. We are here representing the people of this entire Government. We have a great and glorious country, one worthy of all love, all respect, of every emotion of patriotism. The oppressed of all lands and climes find here a harbinger of peace and plenty. Italy's balmy zephyrs kiss our southern skies and Russia's congealing vapors envelop our northern homes in robes of purest white. The prow of ocean's monster directs her course from America's beach and gladdens the hearts of an amazing world with products of her native home. With our network of railroads, telegraph and telephone lines, a home free to each of the adult citizens of our country, with our coffers groaning under the weight of our precious treasure, we defy the world to refute our claim that America is the most propitious land upon which a benignant sun doth shine to-day. We are patriots. We love our country. We have a country worthy of our love. From the most remote antiquity man, whose soul ever stirred with patriotic emotions, has gone forth at his country's call, and has staked his life and his sacred honor in his devotion to her cause. The war songs of every age and nation have awakened the strongest passions and have stirred the deepest emotions of her warriors. In the glorious achievements of those who have suffered in humanity's cause, the bard has awakened the slumbering chord of his noble lyre and called forth the beatific strains which still float upon the tide of time. The grandest monument which can commemorate the deeds of men is that which the patriot erects in the affections of his countrymen. [Applause.]

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Chairman, this is undoubtedly one of the most important subjects that has come before Congress for many years. That proposition is conceded on all sides. Why is it important? It is important because the great life-insurance companies of this country have been reaching forth their hands and filching from the pockets of our people all over the land. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] stated the other day, it has become the occupation of thieves and the pastime of scoundrels. It is a question of so much importance that our President has seen fit to call the attention of Congress to it again and again. He called the attention of the Fifty-eighth Congress and called our attention to it in the Fifty-ninth Congress, repeating only and emphasizing his advice to the Fifty-eighth Congress. But it has been said that the President is not a lawyer. That may be true; but he is surrounded by lawyers. He has a Department of Justice, and there there are able, thoroughgoing lawyers who have undoubtedly examined this question and examined it carefully and have advised the President as to its legal status. After this advice has been considered, he sees fit to call the attention of Congress to the subject.

Now, I assume that it is the opinion of the President of the United States and the opinion of the Department of Justice, and that it has been their opinion for some time, that Congress has jurisdiction and power to deal with this subject; otherwise it were folly for the President to repeatedly call our attention to it.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania the other day said that he himself had discussed the constitutionality of the question with an Assistant Attorney-General of the United States and had been assured that in the opinion of that gentleman there was no question but what Congress had power to deal with the subject.

I am aware of the fact that a great many gentlemen believe that Congress has no jurisdiction and power. That opinion is founded entirely upon a few decisions rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States, the first being Paul against Virginia, rendered in 1868, or nearly forty years ago. I submit, gentlemen, that at that time the insurance proposition was not what it is to-day; that in the years that have elapsed since 1868 to the present time insurance has come to be a vastly different proposition from what it was when the opinion in the case of Paul v. Virginia was rendered. We did not at that time have any Hydes, McCalls, and McCurdys, and others whose names have now become quite familiar to the American people. The other day I read, and I presume that other gentlemen have done so, that this young man of Equitable fame gave a dinner costing twenty or thirty thousand dollars to Sarah Bernhardt. At the same time perhaps some poor woman and babies may have been dying of starvation in the same precinct where he was giving his dinner. Had he used the money for the purpose of buying them some of the comforts and necessaries of life we might applaud and not complain, but we have a right to complain when he blows in that much money to make a good fellow of himself with Sarah Bernhardt, because it is our money that he is using when he does it.

I was saying that insurance is a different proposition now from what it was some years ago. The Supreme Court of the United States has declared that what is an article of commerce is determinable by the usage of the commercial world. That is held in the case reported in 125 United States, page 465. As stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts the other day, the case of Paul v. Virginia was practically overruled in the case of Champion against Ames. The court held there that a lottery ticket, while of only nominal value, was a subject of commerce, and where it has been sent from one State to another that it is the subject of interstate commerce. An insurance policy may not be a lottery ticket; but I assume as a matter of fact that a policy written by any of the solvent insurance companies of this country ought to be of equal value with a lottery ticket, ninety-nine out of every one hundred of which are absolutely worthless, and only blanks. Then a policy of insurance is a thing of value. I submit that it is a commodity, and I submit that it is commerce. The effect of the ruling in Champion v. Ames has practically overruled the principle involved in Paul against Virginia, upon which gentlemen claim that insurance is not commerce.

Again, it has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States that the sending of a telegram is commerce, and that the sending of a telegram from one State into another State is interstate commerce. That was held in the case of the Pensacola Telegraph Company against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Now, then, I desire to give what Justice Field, who, I think, wrote the opinion in the case of Paul v. Virginia, has to say concerning the effect of the decision in the case of the Pensacola Telegraph Company against the Western Union Telegraph Company.

> By the decision now rendered Congressional legislation can take this control from the State and even thrust within its borders a corporation from other States in no way responsible to it.

The effect of the opinion in Paul v. Virginia was that this could not be done. In the latter case it has been held that it may be done, and one of the able judges who rendered the opinion in Paul v. Virginia recognizes the fact.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague permit a question?

Mr. McCARTHY. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to know what case it is from which you have read the extract?

Mr. McCARTHY. That is from the case of the Pensacola Telegraph Company v. The Western Union Telegraph Company, which arose in this way: The Pensacola Telegraph Company was authorized by the State and given an exclusive franchise. The Western Union Telegraph Company entered that State, and the question arose as to whether the Western Union had any authority to enter the State and transact business there when an exclusive franchise had been given to the other company.

Mr. NORRIS. The Western Union being a foreign corporation.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes; and the Supreme Court of the United States held that the Western Union might do so, and Justice Field used the language which I have just quoted.

It may be true, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] has just said, that the mere statement of this proposition is preposterous; but I do not think so. What is the definition of commerce? It is defined as trade, traffic, and intercourse. Now, when a gentleman from New York goes into Nebraska and undertakes to sell life insurance or any other kind of insurance, I submit that he is trading with our people. I submit that the business he is engaged in is trade and traffic with our people. I submit that it is intercourse with our people, and if it is not I want to know what it is.

The Iowa court has held that insurance is a commodity. You will find this in 102 Iowa, at page 602, and the Supreme Court of the United States has held that commerce is an exchange of commodities, and an exchange of commodities between citizens of different States is interstate commerce. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that the power to determine what articles may become subjects of commerce is in Congress—that is, that Congress has the power to determine what subjects may become articles of commerce.

Now, I would be as reluctant as any gentleman on the floor of this House to see the Federal Government usurp the functions of a State or the powers of a State, or venture upon the domain of States rights. I can not agree with the gentleman that the nearer the Government is to us the purer and more perfect that Government is. I believe that there are subjects that the Federal Government can deal with more effectively than State governments can deal with them, and I believe that this is one of the subjects. At any rate it must be conceded, notwithstanding what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] has said concerning the wise and beneficent laws of his State, that the State governments have made a most dismal failure in their attempt to regulate and control insurance corporations. Why do I believe that? Because, notwithstanding the laws which we find on the different State statute books, some of which have been there for many years, all of the evils, all of the wrongs, and all of the abuses that our people complain of have developed while those laws have been in existence. Some of the best, wisest, and strongest of the insurance commissioners from those States where they have the best laws, have admitted that State control has proved an absolute failure, and they are the ones who have recommended that Federal legislation be enacted upon this subjcet.

The Supreme Court has held that the courts can not hold that any article which Congress recognizes as the subject of interstate commerce is not such, and I have no doubt that should Congress enact a law declaring insurance to be commerce, and transactions between citizens of different States to be interstate commerce, the Supreme Court would sustain that law.

Now, perhaps nothing is pertinent at this time unless it is confined strictly to the pending motion, and I submit that this part of the President's message should be referred to a committee that is willing to act upon it and not to a committee that has already prejudged the case, that has already decided that, notwithstanding the suggestions of the President, this body has no jurisdiction and no power to act.

I submit that it is proper to refer this subject to the Interstate Commerce Committee. That is the committee that ought to consider the question, in my opinion. There is a committee of fair-minded gentlemen, of able gentlemen, many of whom are lawyers, and an opportunity will undoubtedly be given to every member of the Judiciary Committee, and to every lawyer who is a Member of this House, to appear before that committee and submit any statement of fact or legal conclusions desired. And there is no question but what the subject will be carefully, thoroughly, and learnedly considered by that committee. I do not believe that a tax upon these insurance companies will afford adequate relief. In my opinion all that the companies will do is simply to pay the tax and add that much to the premiums which they require their policy holders to pay. It is the man way down at the bottom who, in the last analysis, pays the taxes in every instance.

I might cite instances where the Federal Government has dealt more thoroughly with problems than have the local governments. If it be true that the nearer the government to the people the purer and wiser and better the government, how is it that the rottenest specimens of government that we can find or ever heard tell of are found right at home, in our own municipalities where we live? No other form of government is to be compared with them for corruption. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the greatest question before the American public to-day is, in my opinion, that in reference to the regulation of interstate railroad and interstate terminal rates. The President of the United States very wisely gave this subject a very prominent place in his message, and in that document, while calling the attention of Congress to the railroad-rate question, did not fail to call attention to the necessity of Federal legislation in reference to interstate terminal evils. [Applause.]

The city of St. Louis is to-day recognized as the greatest railroad center in the world from the standpoint of mileage. There is a greater railroad mileage centering at St. Louis than there is at any other city in the world. More than twenty great railroads pass through St. Louis. In fact, there is scarcely a transcontinental line but touches St. Louis; and yet, notwithstanding that fact, St. Louis, in one sense the greatest railroad center in the world, is nevertheless not on the railroad map. Some of the gentlemen present would probably not understand what I mean when I say that St. Louis is not on the railroad map. But when I tell you that if you will go to the depot here at Washington and try to ship a barrel of flour to St. Louis you can not do it, but, on the contrary, you would be compelled to ship it to East St. Louis, Ill., and from East St. Louis reship it to St. Louis, and pay a charge for the second shipment at an abnormally high rate, you will understand partially what I mean. But to this I shall refer again later on.

All of the railroads of which I speak must cross the Mississippi River somewhere in the vicinity of St. Louis. Some years back there was constructed between the cities of East St. Louis, Ill., and St. Louis, Mo., across the Father of Waters, that magnificent structure known as Eads Bridge. The Eads Bridge was controlled by a holding company, and the rates were considered to be arbitrary. To prevent this evil another bridge was constructed, called the Merchants' Bridge. In the charter granting the privilege of constructing this second bridge across the Mississippi River, Congress especially specified that there would be no combination between it and the first bridge or between the Eads Bridge and the Merchants' Bridge; and, further, especially provided that in the event that there was any such combination that the charter should be forfeited.

Notwithstanding these wise provisions in the charter, not many years rolled around before a holding company was formed, and this holding company acquired the control of the Eads Bridge and also of the Merchants' Bridge; and, not satisfied with this, acquired also the control of the bridge at Alton, some 30 miles up the river, and, still not satisfied, this holding company secured also the control of all the interstate terminals on either bank of the river, and eventually acquired control of all the ferries plying across the river for many miles along its shores. To show you the extent to which this holding company went in order to acquire a complete monopoly of all accesses to St. Louis, I tell you that in purchasing the control of the ferries across the river it paid as high as from fifteen hundred to sixteen hundred dollars per share for stock which had never been valued at more than from two to three hundred dollars per share.

Thus it has developed that an immense combination of corporate interests, known as a holding company, has the absolute control of all the bridges, of all the ferries, and of all the interstate terminal facilities for miles up and down the Mississippi River, and in this way controls every avenue of trade leading into the city of St. Louis; and, worse than that, controls the avenues of trade leading from the East to the West. This combination of corporate interests is the master of a gateway at the center of the nation, and, in its absolute dictatorship of this gateway at the crossing of the roads of national commerce, restrains the interstate trade from the East to the West, injuring at the same time the manufacturing industries of New York and New Haven and the shipper of wheat, corn, and cattle in the West and Southwest.

This immense corporation is not composed, as a general thing, of St. Louis citizens, but is rather composed, controlled, and dominated by men who live in New York and Philadelphia, in England and in France.

Fourteen great railroad corporations have combined to form this gigantic trust. Fourteen great railroads have joined to form this holding company, and so complete is the monopoly that they have acquired and so vast are the revenues that they are enabled to exact from the commerce of the nation that the proceeds derived are almost sufficient to satisfy, even when divided by fourteen, these great railroads; is almost sufficient to meet the demands of the multimillionaires living in New York, London, and Paris.

No greater conspiracy against trade and commerce can be discovered in the history of the past. Never before did a combination of corporate interests so completely obtain a controlling hold upon commerce and trade as has this holding company obtained upon the commerce which crosses the center of our nation. This holding company, conscienceless, remorseless, merciless, has demanded its pound of flesh from the manufacturer, the merchant, and the tiller of the soil with like impunity.

Not satisfied with these so-called "legitimate victims," and forgetting the old adage of "honor among thieves," this combination of fourteen great railroads has, in years past, and is to-day, squeezing and harassing all the other railroads that have the audacity to attempt to compete with them in the trade of the Southwest. A few years back the Rock Island Railroad Company, an independent line, a line not having a finger in the terminal pie, a line not recognized as one of the fourteen conspirators, attempted to purchase its own terminals, and to this end attempted to buy the Wiggins Ferry, with its terminals leading into St. Louis, so that it might have free access into the city and be relieved thereby of paying tribute to this terminal company. But the great Rock Island Company—great and powerful and controlled by wealthy and ingenious financiers as it was—did not realize the task that it was undertaking. In order to checkmate the purpose of the Rock Island system, this terminal association trust paid five times the value of the Wiggins Ferry system to prevent its falling into the hands of the Rock Island company. The result was that the Rock Island failed in its attempt to gain a free access into the city of St. Louis, and was compelled to bend the knee and to contribute also its mite to the already overflowing coffers of this terminal trust. Even great railroad systems are powerless to contend against so giant an aggregation of capitalization, which is not composed of millions nor of tens of millions, but the capitalization of this great terminal railroad combination is expressed in nine figures. It is a matter of hundreds of millions of dollars.

Having thus acquired a complete monopoly of all the avenues of trade leading into St. Louis and from there to the great southwestern territory, this combination of parallel competing lines, which could only exist by virtue of violations of the Sherman antitrust law, began at once to violate the interstate-commerce laws by fixing and collecting arbitrary rates on all freight and passenger traffic entering St. Louis or billed to the Southwest. It is impossible for man, woman, or child to enter St. Louis from the east or to leave St. Louis going toward the east without paying a poll tax to this trust, for they charge so much a head for man, woman, and child entering or leaving St. Louis, just as they charge so much a head for horses, cattle, and swine that are shipped across the river from the great cattle fields of the Southwest. But this is by far the least of the injuries. It is impossible to ship a pound of butter, a dozen of eggs, or a carload of coal into the city of St. Louis without paying, forsooth, an abnormal terminal tax. Worse than this, you can not ship these goods into St. Louis at all except at the will of this terminal trust, which has chosen the fair city of St. Louis as its special prey and the great Southwest as its own domain.

I have some figures here. It costs just 4 cents per ton to bring coal 60 miles to East St. Louis from points in Illinois, and then it must be reshipped across the river to St. Louis at a cost of 30 cents per ton. Think of that! It costs more than seven times as much to ship a ton of coal 2 or 3 miles across the Mississippi River than it does to ship it 60 miles across the country from a point in Illinois. From the coal fields of the State of Illinois last year 6,000,000 tons of soft coal were shipped across the river, and the price paid for that one item for that one State, going one way at 30 cents per ton, was $1,800,000. If the tax thus levied at this price on this one item of soft coal from one State in one year is $1,800,000, what, then, must the tax have been on all the various products that go across that river? What must it have been when the sum total of all the taxes levied upon all the passengers that go across the river is also computed?

You will be astonished when I tell you that if you buy a ticket from here to California on any of the railroads that are not in the trust you will be charged, without knowing it yourself, but you will be charged, nevertheless, or the railroad from whom you buy the ticket will be charged, 25 cents for your passage across the river, and if you go via one of the railroad companies that are in the trust you will be charged just 5 cents. And, gentlemen, the total amount of real property involved in these terminals and bridges is not very great, comparatively, while the tax levied on the people by this terminal trust is vastly greater than the total valuation of all the property that they own.

The voice that you now hear is not that of one crying in the wilderness, but is rather the echo of a complaint that has been loud, long, and lasting, and comes to you from the business men and the manufacturing industries of St. Louis and the Southwest. Not alone for myself do I speak. I am speaking for the thirty associations of business men organized in St. Louis. These associations have petitioned for redress from the crimes against interstate commerce committed by this holding trust. I am speaking for thirty business associations, whose membership comprises several thousand of the best business citizens of St. Louis, who ask that Congress, by the power granted to it by the Constitution and by its inherent power to correct a wrong to interstate commerce and trade, step in and with a controlling hand remedy the evil that has been done. [Applause.]

Do you ask why the business men of St. Louis and the Southwest are complaining against this great injury? If you lived in St. Louis you would not need to be told the reason why. If you lived in St. Louis you would find that it would be impossible for you to leave the city toward the East without paying tribute. If you lived in St. Louis you would understand that the growth of the city, the growth of the commerce of the Southwest, is being restrained by this combination of corporate interests and that an unlawful tax was being imposed upon one and all alike.

Nor is the question a local one. The coal shipper of West Virginia, the merchant who ships out the boots and shoes of New England, the manufacturers of Chicago who trade with the Southwest are alike taxed and hampered by this company, for all the products and industries of the nation that pass through the avenues of trade in the vicinity of St. Louis are subject to a tax imposed by this terminal trust.

Having an absolute arbitrary, the charges are, in many instances, extortionate. And who, you ask, fixes these charges? Are they passed upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission? No. Are they examined by the railroad authorities of the State of Missouri or of the State of Illinois? No; there is no power in such authorities to regulate this combination, this question of interstate commerce. It is a national question. The sovereign people of the various States can fix the railroad charges within their State lines, but they can not govern the rates to be charged across this river between two sovereign States. And so, as years have passed, as the power of this company grew, as it discovered that its position was arbitrary, the rates that were charged upon the commerce, trade, and travel were fixed by people living on the Hudson, or the Thames, who were guided only by that maxim "all the traffic will stand."

And who pays this tax ultimately? It must come sooner or later from the consumer. It must come from the cattle raiser of the Southwest, from the man who goes early in the morning to sow the corn and wheat on our Western farms, and who, after months of toil, in the golden dusk of evening, gathers in the harvest as a contribution to this terminal combine. The uncrowned (so-called) American king, the farmer, the cattle raiser, the small producer, ultimately pay for all this, and in so doing pay into the coffers of this great holding trust all of these illegal charges, from whence it is divided among these fourteen railroads and in turn distributed to the men who live in princely villas.

This absolute trust, unfortunately holds the key to every access to the city of St. Louis, and without its assent neither person nor freight can enter. There is but one "open sesame" to the metropolis of the Southwest, and that is the will of this corporate combination.

And now, I wish to get to another and still more astonishing evil that arises from this violation of the Sherman Anti-trust Act, and from this violation of the expressed law of the nation in reference to interstate commerce. It is this: This holding company, this company that controls every avenue of trade or travel into the city of St. Louis, and from whose jurisdiction there is no escape, this company to whom all must bend the knee, is in a position to favor certain shippers and disfavor others. You have heard on the floor of this House during the last few days statements showing how, by means of private car companies, by means of rebates, and by other devices, certain shippers are favored by railroads, but with all the astonishing statements that you have heard, there is none that shows the flagrant outrages and direct violations of law that are put in force by this holding trust. There are several ways in which it can be done. There are one or two ways in which it is done.

As I have already stated, freight is not shipped directly to St. Louis, but is shipped to East St. Louis, Ill. It so happens that there is a great congestion at the terminals on the Illinois side. Freight arrives from the East at East St. Louis and is there stopped. Now, if you are so fortunate as to be a favored shipper of this company, if you are on their list as a favored patron, your freight is speedily sent across the river, but if you are not a favored shipper your freight will probably be sidetracked, and, although you will be astonished to hear my words, weeks and sometimes months pass before you would get your freight at all, and the excuse that would be given would be the congested conditions that exist.

Gentlemen, think of a modern city with a Chinese wall built around it! Think of a modern city having a tollgate at its portals! Think of the metropolis of the Louisiana purchase locked behind a gate with the key in the hands of a soulless trust!

In ancient times, in the days of classic Greece and Rome, men built walls about their cities for protection, to keep out invading hordes of robbers and thieves, to keep out invading armies, if you like, but by the strange caprice of modern commerce in the days when men have departed from chivalry and have bent their time and energies in the pursuit of avaricious conquest, we find here a modern city, more splendid than any that graced the plains of Greece, with a modern wall built around it for a far different purpose. A wall without form, invisible, but from the mere fact of its invisibleness, more difficult to pull down, and existing there not for the protection of the citizens, nor to keep out an invading army, but placed there to keep out the traveling public and the products of the manufacturers until a tax is paid. In ancient times there were no such walls as this. The ancients welcomed the commerce that came to their cities, and opened up the gates of their cities to the booty that their conquering armies had brought; but here is a modern city which is shut out and restrained from legitimate and free commercial intercourse.

Last Wednesday I introduced in this House a resolution providing for a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, especially appointed to investigate these conditions. In introducing this resolution I did not act on my own initiative alone. In doing so, I was a mere agent of some seven hundred thousand people of the city of St. Louis. I believe in doing so that I was also the agent of the manufacturers of the East and of the West and of the traveling public. I am, I know, the direct agent of 23 leading business organizations of St. Louis, for 23 of the leading business associations of St. Louis have united in requesting that action be taken in this matter, and at their request I introduced the resolution. They are to-day appealing to Congress and at this moment I have the honor to be their mouthpiece. [Applause.]

The citizens and business associations of St. Louis have come to you with this appeal. They are telling you that the growth of the fair city of St. Louis is unlawfully restrained by this combination of corporate interests which has grasped the very life of the city. They are telling you that manufacturers are leaving the city on account of the poor shipping facilities and on account of the arbitrary charges imposed by this trust on all freight that they may receive or send out. They are telling you that the great city of St. Louis, located as it is on the Father of Waters, near the juncture of the Missouri, the Illinois, and the Ohio rivers, is destined by nature to be the great gem of the interior of the American continent. Situated as it is at the very crossing of the highways of our nation, it is the gateway and emporium of the fertile Southwest, which is the great and future coming country. Having tributary to its commerce fields with all kinds of grain, quarries with all kinds of stone, mines with all kinds of minerals, and forests with all kinds of timber, St. Louis is destined by its situation to be the great central city of our nation.

That the progress of this city should be restrained by a master more tyrannical than any of which we read in fabled story is a travesty on the modern laws of commerce. Its citizens will always protest against the blighting of its destined career by this terminal monopoly, whose greed is measured and equaled only by the richness of the country it holds tributary.

Let us hope that there is not one law for the poor and another for the rich; let us hope that the law of our land will not send to jail a poor tramp who steals a ride on one of the cars owned by a trust, while at the same time it honors and commends the officials of the same trust who have stolen the wealth of a city. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the resolution that I introduced last Wednesday is as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 46) providing for the creation of a joint committee to investigate the combination of corporate interests controlling the bridges across the Mississippi River in the vicinity of the city of St. Louis, in restraint of free interstate traffic and trade.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a committee of nine members, to consist of four Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to be known as a special committee of the Fifty-ninth Congress for the investigation of the combination of corporate interests controlling the bridges, ferries, and terminal facilities across the Mississippi River between the States of Illinois and Missouri in the vicinity of the city of St. Louis in violation of free interstate traffic and trade, be, and the same is hereby, created.

It shall be the duty of said committee to investigate and inquire into the complaints made by the citizens and business associations of the States of Missouri and Illinois against the Terminal Railroad Association, of St. Louis, in the following particulars:

First. The complaint made by the citizens and business associations of the States of Missouri and Illinois that said Terminal Railroad Association, of St. Louis, is a combination of corporate interests controlling all the bridges and ferries across the Mississippi River in the vicinity of St. Louis between the States of Missouri and Illinois and all interstate terminal facilities on either bank of said Mississippi River in violation of the express law of the nation in reference to trusts and combinations of corporate interests.

Second. The complaint made by the citizens of the said States that the said combination of corporate interests controlling all the avenues of commerce across the said Mississippi River is charging arbitrary rates on all freight and passenger traffic across the said river in violation of the law of the nation in reference to interstate commerce and trade and in restraint of free interstate traffic.

In performance of its said duties the said committee shall have power to sit during the term of the Fifty-ninth Congress, to compel the attendance of witnesses, and the production of books and papers, and to do and perform all things necessary to accomplish the fulfillment of its said duties.

The said committee shall report its findings in writing to the Senate and House of Representatives and to the Attorney-General of the United States.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask if the business associations of St. Louis have appealed to the Interstate Commerce Commission for relief; and if so, what was the result?

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. In answer to the gentleman's question I will state that they have appealed in all directions. Not very many days ago there came to Washington a petition signed by many thousands of the business people of St. Louis, in which they appealed to the President of the United States. And one of the requests I received from St. Louis was to introduce a resolution in this House, which I would be glad to do, commending and thanking and approving the course of President Roosevelt, who, I believe, is a citizen who fears none and who does recognize equal rights to all; because President Roosevelt not more than thirty days ago took up this matter and instructed the Attorney-General of the United States to commence suit at St. Louis to disrupt this trust. That suit is about to be commenced, I believe. What its end will be I know not; but I will state that we have made in the past other attempts. The business men of St. Louis are to-day circulating and agitating the question of building a free bridge across this river. In years past, for more than a decade, the business men of St. Louis have appealed in every direction, but it seems that their efforts have been futile. They have appealed to the Interstate Commerce Commission and in every other direction, and at times success seemed to be within their reach; but in every event the final victory, the final result was that the grip of this trust was fastened more firmly upon the city, because it attained the final verdict. So to-day the people of St. Louis are reaching down into their own pockets and propose to build a free bridge, costing several millions of dollars, across that river and open the bridge to all the people of the world, so that they may go across without charge; so that the commerce of the Southwest may go without tax to the Northeast; so that the disgrace of having a tollgate at the center of our nation may be removed. I say that the question is being agitated, and I believe that we will have our free bridge; but I will say this: The people of the city of St. Louis ought not to be compelled to reach down into their pockets and raise millions of dollars to build this bridge, and thereby recognize that the laws of this nation can not be upheld, and thereby recognize that a trust, however great it may be, is greater than the law. The law should be enforced, free bridge or no free bridge. [Applause.]

I tell you that in St. Louis hardly a night goes by but there is a meeting held discussing this question. All through the city public meetings have been held, and within the next few months the question of bonds or no bonds for the building of this bridge will be submitted to the people. In this fight the municipality has to contend with a combination of corporate interests that has hundreds of millions at its disposal and usually has its way in politics. In speaking these words I am probably sounding my own political knell; but as to this I care not. Though it might mean my own political ruin, I still would say that some action ought to be taken in this matter by this body in behalf of the people of St. Louis. This combination of corporate interests and all other industries should be told by the firm voice of the law that in America all must bend the knee to but one sovereign power, and that is the will of the people as expressed by the law of the land. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Chairman, the discussion that has taken place on the resolution now before the committee has certainly taken a very wide range. The whole subject of insurance and the proper regulation of the great corporations engaged in that business have been most thoroughly and completely covered by the debates which have already taken place on this floor. It is not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, at this time to enter upon an elaborate discussion of the insurance question. As introductory to what I desire to say upon another subject, I simply wish to call the attention of the committee to the divergent views that have been expressed in regard to the regulation of insurance companies.

We heard the other day a very clear and logical discussion of the question by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], who argued in favor of a more strict regulation of the companies by State authority, and whose arguments finally developed into a complete discussion of the relative growth of the powers of the national and of the State governments. We listened with a great deal of pleasure to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], and if at times he overlooked some established facts, we readily forgave him, because we all fully realize that an orator can not at all times be hampered by such commonplace things as facts, but must, like a poet, be permitted on occasions to give his imagination full swing. [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman seriously urged upon the floor of this House that Congress ought to consider whether it should not exercise the power given to it by the Constitution to guarantee a republican form of government to the different States, and that in the exercise of that power, because of the growth of these insurance companies, the Congress of the United States ought to go before the world to-day with an investigation to determine whether or not the growth of these great business institutions did not threaten the very life of the Republic, as a remedy for all the evils and the abuses that we all deplore and condemn and which have been brought to the attention of the American people in a startling manner by the investigation now taking place in New York. He proposed that the insurance companies should be limited in the transaction of their business to the States where they had been incorporated. We listened yesterday to a most entertaining and in some respects very persuasive argument by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS] in favor of a measure which he has introduced in this Congress to gain control of these corporations by regulating the transaction of their business in the District of Columbia, the Territories, and in our insular possessions. It has also been mooted in the debate that we should exercise our undoubted power of taxation either for the purpose of obtaining revenue by taxing insurance companies or using the taxing power for the indirect purpose of controlling them in the transaction of their business. It has also been proposed in this debate that we should use the control of the mails and the post-office facilities of this country for the purpose of regulating the business of insurance companies. There may have been some other propositions advanced upon this floor that I did not happen to hear, but I have at least mentioned enough to satisfy any careful man that sentiment certainly has not up to this time crystallized in favor of any given proposition.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that perhaps it would be the part of wise statesmanship to digest the information now being gathered before entering upon the field of constructive legislation for the regulation of these companies. It is not, however, my purpose, as I stated in my opening remarks, to determine which path Congress ought to pursue. It is not our duty or our province at this particular time to legislate upon this question. The sole question now before this committee is the proper reference of that portion of the President's message relating to the insurance problem.

For myself, I shall vote in favor of referring that portion of the President's message to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. In doing so I do not feel that I am committed to the proposition that insurance is commerce, and neither do I feel that the House of Representatives, should it take that action upon that part of the message, is committed to that proposition. I am largely influenced in the conclusion I have reached upon that question by the language of the message itself. The President refers to the insurance problem in connection with interstate commerce. It is his message that we are now discussing, and trying to determine to which of the standing committees of the House it should be referred.

I certainly shall not vote in favor of referring that portion of the message to the Committee on Ways and Means. There is not a suggestion in the message of the President concerning the raising of revenue by taxing insurance companies, or any suggestion that we can control or regulate the business of the insurance companies by exercising our undoubted power of taxation. Neither do I think that this is the appropriate time to refer that portion of the message to the Committee on the Judiciary. It may be that before this Congress adjourns, if any of the standing committees of the House should report a bill upon the insurance question, that this House may desire the opinion of the Judiciary Committee upon the constitutional questions involved. It will be then, and only then, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that it will be proper to refer this portion of the message to the Judiciary Committee.

But, as I said, Mr. Chairman, it was not for the purpose of discussing the insurance question that I have claimed the privileges of the floor at this time. The discussion by this committee has covered pretty nearly every subject referred to in the message of the President. I realize that the insurance question is a very important one, and one which I trust will receive the careful and statesmanlike consideration of this House.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is one question referred to in the President's message which, to my mind, is far more important than the insurance problem. It is the most important question, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that could engage the attention of the Congress. It is most important, sir, because it lies at the very foundation of the proper solution of all other questions. The tribunal to which all questions, under our form of government, must in the end be submitted is the American electorate. Unless that electorate, in the exercise of the elective franchise, shall be protected from fraud and corruption—the most insidious foes in all history to republican forms of government—we can not hope for a proper solution of any of the great problems that agitate the American people.

The President of the United States, in his message to the Fifty-ninth Congress, as in his message to the last session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, referred to this question. He makes two distinct recommendations in his message to the present Congress, one in reference to the control of Federal elections, and the other regarding contributions by corporations to political parties when Federal officers are to be voted for. In the message as it comes to us we find on page 20 the following recommendation:

> In my last annual message I said:
> "The power of the Government to protect the integrity of the elections of its own officials is inherent and has been recognized and affirmed by repeated declarations of the Supreme Court. There is no enemy of free government more dangerous and none so insidious as the corruption of the electorate. No one defends or excuses corruption, and it would seem to follow that none would oppose vigorous measures to eradicate it. I recommend the enactment of a law directed against bribery and corruption in Federal elections. The details of such a law may be safely left to the wise discretion of the Congress, but it should go as far as under the Constitution it is possible to go, and should include severe penalties against him who gives or receives a bribe intended to influence his act or opinion as an elector; and provisions for the publication not only of the expenditures for nominations and elections of all candidates, but also of all contributions received and expenditures made by political committees."
> I desire to repeat this recommendation—

says the President.

Mr. Chairman, while we have been discussing the question whether we could extend the power of the Federal Government under the interstate-commerce clause or some other clause of the Constitution to control the business of insurance, here is a power delegated to us by the Constitution of the United States, and which we have absolutely at the persent time, but have failed to exercise. There can be no question of the right of Congress in the election of its own officers to provide what wrongs shall constitute a crime against the National Government, and to provide for the punishment of those guilty of those wrongs in the courts of the United States. It is an anomalous condition, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this great Government has not upon its statute books a statute making an offense out of wrongs committed at elections by those guilty of fraud in the election of its own officers.

I know that some gentlemen will say that the various States have laws governing these matters, and that the States can be depended upon to take care of that proposition. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it does not comport with the dignity of the National Government that it should be dependent upon any other sovereignty for the protection of its own honor and its own integrity. By the Constitution of the United States, by section 4, Article I, of the Constitution, we are given this power in express terms.

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may, at any time, by law make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators.

It is not my purpose to enter into the details of such a law as I think should be passed under this power. I introduced at the last session, and have reintroduced at this session, a bill which does show what I believe should be the character of legislation enacted by Congress. I would not have the Federal Government take any supervision or control over elections. I would, in short, simply provide that bribery or any form of corruption at the election of Representatives or Presidential electors should constitute a crime against the Federal Government, and that these crimes should be prosecuted and punished through the Federal courts and by the Federal officers.

It is no longer an open question as to whether we have the right to pass and enact such laws. The Supreme Court of the United States has spoken in no uncertain terms upon this proposition. In the case known as Ex parte Siebold (100 U. S., 387), the Supreme Court uses the following language:

It is objected that Congress has no power to enforce State laws or to punish State officers, and especially has no power to punish them for violating the laws of their own State. As a general proposition this is undoubtedly true; but when, in the performance of their functions, State officers are called upon to fulfill duties which they owe to the United States as well as to the State, has the former no means of compelling such fulfillment? Yet that is the case here. It is the duty of the States to elect Representatives to Congress. The due and fair elections of these Representatives is of vital importance to the United States. The Government of the United States is no less concerned in the transaction than the State government is. It certainly is not bound to stand by as a passive spectator when duties are violated and outrageous frauds are committed. It is directly interested in the faithful performance by the officers of election of their respective duties. Those duties are owed as well to the United States as to the State. This necessarily follows from the mixed character of the transaction—State and national. A violation of duty is an offense against the United States for which the offender is justly amenable to that Government. No official position can shelter him from this responsibility. In view of the fact that Congress has plenary and paramount jurisdiction over the whole subject, it seems almost absurd to say that an officer who receives or has custody of the ballots given for a Representative owes no duty to the National Government which Congress can enforce, or that an officer who stuffs the ballot box can not be made amenable to the United States. If Congress has not, prior to the passage of the present laws, imposed any penalties to prevent and punish frauds and violations of duty committed by officers of election, it has been because the exigency has not been deemed sufficient to require it and not because Congress had not the requisite power.

The court also says in this same case:

The true doctrine, as we conceive, is this, that whilst the States are really sovereign as to all matters which have not been granted to the jurisdiction and control of the United States, the Constitution and constitutional laws of the latter are, as we have already said, the supreme law of the land, and when they conflict with the laws of the State they are of paramount authority and obligation. This is the fundamental principle on which the authority of the Constitution is based, and unless it be conceded in practice as well as theory, the fabric of our institutions, as it was contemplated by its founders, can not stand. The questions involved have respect not more to the autonomy and existence of the States than to the continued existence of the United States as a Government to which every American citizen can look for security and protection in every part of the land.

We think that the cause of commitment in these cases was lawful, and that the application for the writ of habeas corpus must be denied.

That case, Mr. Chairman, went before the Supreme Court at a time when we did have some statutes upon the Federal statute books regulating what offenses at elections of Federal officers constituted a crime against the National Government. In the repeal of the force bill, apparently without proper consideration, not only were all the provisions of that bill which gave to the National Government power to supervise and control elections repealed, but also those other provisions which did not partake in the slightest degree of force were wiped out at the same time. So at the present time there are no statutes upon the national statute book regulating what constitutes crime against the National Government in the election of its own officers.

It requires no argument, Mr. Chairman, to demonstrate the necessity for legislation of this kind. At every session of Congress we are called upon to pass upon half a dozen, and sometimes many more, election contests. These contests frequently arouse very bitter partisan feeling; and yet, after we are through with the contest, after we have determined by the contest that Mr. A. or Mr. B. is entitled to his seat in this body, the National Government, whose honor and whose integrity has been violated by the commission of the crime, has no power whatever to reach out its strong arm and bring those who have been guilty of that wrong and that crime against the National Government to the courts of this Government for punishment. The necessity for legislation of this character is made apparent from the records of Congress. The power to legislate upon the question is given to us by the Constitution as it has been construed by the Supreme Court. I have referred to one case, and I shall refer only to one other, and shall read only a paragraph or two from that decision. In the case of Ex parte Yarbrough (110 U. S., 651) the Supreme Court again said:

That a government whose essential character is republican, whose executive head and legislative body are both elective, whose most numerous and powerful branch of the legislature is elected by the people directly, has no power by appropriate laws to secure their election from the influence of violence, of corruption, and of fraud, is a proposition so startling as to arrest attention and demand the gravest consideration.

If this Government is anything more than a mere aggregation of delegated agents of other States and governments, each of which is superior to the General Government, it must have the power to protect the elections on which its existence depends from violence and corruption.

If it has not this power it is left helpless before the two great natural and historical enemies of all republics, open violence and insidious corruption.

* * * * * * *

Will it be denied that it is in the power of that body to provide laws for the proper conduct of those elections? To provide, if necessary, the officers who shall conduct them and make return of the result? And especially to provide, in an election held under its own authority, for security of life and limb to the voter while in the exercise of this function? Can it be doubted that Congress can by law protect the act of voting, the place where it is done, and the man who votes from personal violence or intimidation and the election itself from corruption and fraud?

* * * * * * *

It is as essential to the successful working of this Government that the great organism of its executive and legislative branches should be the free choice of the people as that the original form of it should be so. In absolute governments, where the monarch is the source of all power, it is still held to be important that the exercise of that power shall be free from the influence of extraneous violence and internal corruption.

In a republican government like ours, where political power is reposed in representatives of the entire body of the people chosen at short intervals by popular elections, the temptations to control these elections by violence and by corruption is a constant source of danger.

Such has been the history of all republics, and, though ours has been comparatively free from both these evils in the past, no lover of his country can shut his eyes to the fear of future danger from both sources.

If the recurrence of such acts as these prisoners stand convicted of are too common in one quarter of the country and give omen of danger from lawful violence, the free use of money in elections, arising from the vast growth of recent wealth in other quarters, presents equal cause for anxiety.

The note of warning has been sounded not only by the executive branch of the Government, but also by the judicial department. The attention of Congress has now twice in twelve months been called to the condition by the Chief Magistrate of the nation. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the Fifty-ninth Congress will not, as did the Fifty-eighth Congress, pass into history without placing upon the statute book of the Federal Government legislation which will be competent to prevent the repetition of these crimes at the election of its own officers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I have succeeded in any degree whatever, by what I have said upon this floor, in calling attention to the importance of this question and to the power that is vested in us by the Constitution, I have accomplished all that induced me to claim the attention of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, although so much of the President's message as refers to insurance has been discussed until the subject is almost threadbare, and it is somewhat embarrassing to speak upon it at this stage of the proceedings, the discussion has not been in vain. It has served the purpose of showing the contempt and the disgust that all honest men feel toward the disclosures of high officials touching their management of insurance companies. It shows that the American people are still honest at heart and that the magnitude and the enormity of the crimes have not blinded them to virtue. So much of the message as refers to insurance, in my judgment, should go to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report back whether or not Congress has constitutional warrant to legislate upon this subject. In my own view we have no such authority. Personally, no matter what the committee may report as to the constitutional power of the House, I would not be willing to vote for any measure that would take the right away from the States to control these corporations. It is clear, Mr. Chairman, that if you take the power from the States and lodge it in the Federal Government the people will be in worse plight than they are now. This jurisdiction can not be concurrent. It will be exclusive in one government or in the other. As was so admirably suggested yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS], it is proper for Congress to legislate and to provide for the regulation of insurance in the District of Columbia, and I hope when we have such legislation it will be so wise and so beneficent as to prove a model for every State legislature in the American Union; but, sir, I believe there is sufficient wisdom, sufficient virtue, and sufficient honesty in every State to protect the people against further spoliation.

The legislatures have absolute and supreme power over this question. They can prescribe such conditions and such limitations as they see fit. I desire to call attention to a significant fact. The agitation in favor of the Federal Government assuming control of insurance companies was begun by the insurance officials themselves. In the testimony before the Armstrong committee one of the high officials of the insurance companies, in testifying, touching the vast expenditures that have been made at Albany and other State capitals, added to his testimony this significant remark: "When we get Federal regulation, this difficulty will be obviated." The insurance officials who have clamored for Federal control are the men who do not want any control at all. They want to get out from the power and the jurisdiction of the forty-five legislatures of the forty-five sovereign States. They want a lax, easy, nominal control that will not control. Speaking of the enormous expenditures that were made at Albany and elsewhere, as Mr. McCall alleged, for the purpose of preventing blackmail and vicious legislation, I believe that that statement is as false as the man who uttered it is corrupt.

I do not believe that blackmail and vicious legislation could pass the scrutiny of both houses of the New York assembly, nor do I believe that such legislation could pass the legislature of any State in the American Union. Almost every member in those legislatures is himself interested in insurance. The American people are not opposed to insurance. They want the companies honestly and economically managed. I think that the kind of legislation the insurance officials were watching to prevent was honest, wholesome legislation in the interests of the policy holders that would stop their speculation and spoliation. That is the kind of legislation they wanted to prevent. Now, when the question arises in the various State legislatures, as it is soon to do, because these disclosures have opened the eyes of the American people to the enormity of the crimes of their heretofore trusted trustees, the question will be discussed in all of its phases. The States whose control is absolute, whose power is supreme, can fix conditions and limitations which all companies must comply with to do business in those States.

It has been suggested in the course of this debate that different States might provide conflicting conditions, and hence a company could not possibly comply with the conditions of both States; that in complying with one it would necessarily violate the conditions of the other. In reply to that suggestion, I know of no overpowering necessity that would compel an insurance company to do business in every State of the American Union. If it should come to pass that the State of Nebraska and the State of Mississippi should provide conflicting conditions with which no company could comply, it would be the pleasure of the insurance company to decide which State it would operate in, and let the other severely alone. The States of this Union have the same right—the same legal right and the same moral right—to prescribe upon what terms corporations or citizens can do business within their borders as any gentleman upon this floor has to prescribe upon what conditions his fellow-man can enter his house. If the conditions fixed are too hard, if the limitations fixed are too narrow, and the companies do not want to enter the domain, let them stay out. Suppose they do stay out. In the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], by which we were all charmed and electrified, the happiest suggestion, to my mind, was the proposition to confine corporations of insurance to the States that gave them their charters. Can you conceive of any reason why the great State of Illinois should be dependent upon the State of New York for her insurance companies any more than she should be dependent upon New York for her savings banks?

You have men of ability equal, I know, to the ability of any man who has graced an insurance office, and God knows I hope far superior in integrity, in every State and in every township of the American Union who could take charge of these insurance companies, manage them economically and honestly for the policy holders, invest their money at better rates of interest and keep it within their own borders and build up their own great industries and resources. The greatest source of the money poured into the great city of New York from all sources that contribute to it is the life insurance premium. Even in times of panic it pours in with undiminished strength, in undiminished volume, representing the toil and thrift and industry of the American people. When it goes there instead of being used for legitimate business purposes it has been used in questionable ways and in vicious enterprises. But if it shall come to pass that any State in this Union prescribes conditions that the insurance people are not willing to comply with, that State is to be congratulated. It is not pertinent now and here to discuss the question as to what conditions the various States may prescribe.

If I had the honor to be a member of the legislature of any State in the Union I would endeavor to prescribe conditions that would revolutionize the business. I would provide that no company could do business within the borders of my State which gave any man a salary, either directly or indirectly, in excess of $25,000 a year. Why, in these insurance companies, one man—one of these insurance dignitaries—is considered equal to all the Representatives of the great State of New York on this floor. Their sons, their sons-in-law, their nephews, and their cousins, who have never been heard of in the business world, are drawing princely salaries, $50,000, $75,000, or a hundred thousand dollars a year. The answer to that is the old maxim that the thing is worth what it will fetch. Well, I would like to know what these fellows would fetch if they were put on the market. There are thousands of dry-goods clerks in the city of New York who are the equal of these men in business ability. They are there not by reason of great business reputation that they have made, but they are there by the favoritism of those who have charge.

I was reading in the report of the Armstrong committee the other day this remarkable statement that one of the great companies, not one of the big three, because the millions with which they deal are beyond the comprehension of most men, but one of the companies since its organization has paid out in premiums and death losses $92,000,000 and in the same period of time has paid $130,000,000 in expenses. Forty-one per cent plus had gone to beneficiaries and 58 per cent plus had gone to the officers. I do not care, Mr. Chairman, if you limit the companies to the borders of the State and provide that no company should pay any commission for new business. Review the spectacle now of these great companies going out after business actually at a loss, using funds that have been made and saved and buying new business. The business they are now getting does not pay for itself.

Mr. Chairman, one of the strongest and best of insurance companies in Great Britain employs no agents at all. If a person desires insurance in that company he writes to the home office. He is furnished an application blank, which he fills out. When it reaches the home office, if his family history indicates that he is probably a good risk, then one of their physicians examines him. On the coming in of that report, if he is found to be sound, he is notified that he is accepted, that his premium is a certain amount, and he sends it to the company by mail and they send him a policy. The only expense incurred in the transaction is the physician's fee and a few pennies for postage. Now, Mr. Chairman, these are questions that the States can all deal with in their own way and in their own time. We have not been so fortunate; we have not been so happy in our management of corporations as to encourage the hope that we would have better success with insurance companies. It has been suggested here to-day that the States had signally failed. Unfortunately the States have hitherto legislated upon the assumption that the management of the companies was honest and they were guarding against insolvent companies. Hereafter they will throw safeguards around the companies doing business in their borders; they will make the limitations narrow and the conditions hard; and I believe that out of all this great discussion there will come relief for the American people. But, sir, it will come through the sovereign legislatures of the sovereign States. There is sufficient wisdom, there is sufficient virtue, and there is sufficient honesty in every State in the American Union to protect its own citizenship against spoliation and fraud. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CONNER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 480) entitled "An act supplemental to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans,' approved June 28, 1902, and making appropriations for isthmian canal construction, and for other purposes."

DISTRIBUTION OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SULZER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] desires to have the floor again. When he spoke on a former occasion he reserved the balance of his time.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I introduced into this House the following resolution, which I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it has been published in the newspaper press of the country, and is now generally believed, that the Secretary of the Navy has recommended and contemplates the breaking up and the absolute destruction of the last vestige of one of the most famous historical relics of the United States, namely, the frigate Constitution, lovingly, patriotically, and popularly known as Old Ironsides; and

Whereas the patriotic people of the country regard such contemplated destruction of Old Ironsides with the most profound sorrow and regret, and as an irreparable loss, because Old Ironsides can never be replaced and her like can never be looked upon again if once totally destroyed; and they believe that if only one of her planks remains it should be sacredly saved and preserved as an historic relic: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to send to the House of Representatives as soon as possible all information upon the subject of the contemplated destruction of the frigate Constitution, popularly known as Old Ironsides, and in the meantime to await such further action as the Congress may deem proper to take to prevent such destruction; and be it further

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby respectfully and earnestly requested to promptly intervene and recommend such measures as shall secure the permanent preservation of all that now remains of the frigate Constitution as one of the most sacred historical relics remaining to the people of the United States.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, that is a patriotic resolution and it speaks for itself. I am in favor of it, and I believe it should pass this House without delay. It was introduced by me for the purpose of getting definite information and finding out, through the Secretary of the Navy, as soon as possible, just when, and how, and where, and why the Secretary of the Navy proposed, intended, or contemplated the destruction of the frigate Constitution, popularly known to the American people as "Old Ironsides," and what authority, if any, he has in the premises to destroy this historical relic of the American Navy.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SULZER. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. Do I understand that it is offered as a resolution to be passed on by the committee?

Mr. SULZER. Not at all. It has just been read by the Clerk for the purpose of giving the House notice of what I am going to talk about.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, all right.

Mr. SULZER. I introduced the resolution for the purpose of getting information from the Secretary of the Navy about the frigate Constitution and her proposed destruction. It is privileged under the rules and will come up ere long in the regular way. We do not know just how the old Constitution is to be shot to death, but if it is going to happen, I think the House is entitled to have this information from the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. DALZELL. All right.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the patriotic people of the country were very much surprised a short time ago when they read in the public prints that the Secretary of the Navy proposed to destroy "Old Ironsides," the flagship of Hull and Preble, of Bainbridge, and of gallant Charles Stewart, the grandfather of Charles Stewart Parnell. The Secretary said, if the reports in the newspapers are correct, and I doubt not they are, that this old frigate, the Constitution, now lying at Charlestown Navy-Yard, in Boston Harbor, was of no earthly use, and the best thing that could be done with her was to tow her out to sea and make her a target for American naval gunners to shoot to pieces. Think of it! Imagine, if you can, this official vandalism! It shocked public sentiment. It aroused American patriotism. I can hardly believe it to be true, but if it is true I trust the Secretary of the Navy has heard the indignant remonstrance and the patriotic protest which has rolled into Washington from every part of the country, and that he will do nothing further in the matter. His action has aroused the spirit of the nation. The American people will never consent to the wanton destruction of the frigate Constitution; and, in fact, sir, I doubt if the Secretary of the Navy has any authority to order her demolition. She belongs to the people of the United States, and they will never sell her or give her up; and the Secretary has no more right to destroy her than he has to order the destruction of this Capitol. I think that the Congress has something to say about what shall be done or not done with the people's property, and I hope the Secretary will refrain from further action in the premises until this Congress can act in the matter. Her fate is in our hands. She can not be shot and sunk without our consent. We must stop this sacrilege. The venerable old frigate Constitution should not be destroyed. She is sacred to the American people, and as long as one of her timbers remains she should never be demolished. She was launched in the harbor of Boston in 1797. Her story on the sea is American history, and time can not dim her greatness nor sully her glory. She belongs to Boston, and there let her rest in peace with the Stars and Stripes floating from her masthead until she shall crumble and rot away and be no more. [Applause.]

Once before, Mr. Chairman—a long time ago, away back in 1830—a certain former Secretary of the Navy also proposed the destruction of "Old Ironsides." Is the present Secretary of the Navy familiar with that incident? Does he remember what then happened? Has he forgotten the storm of protests, the white heat of popular indignation, that aroused the people and stirred the very depths of American patriotism? The people then saved the Constitution and the storm of outraged popular sentiment subsided; but at its height there came a flash of poetic lightning, the inspiration of Oliver Wendell Holmes, who wrote this poem on "Old Ironsides:"

Ay, tear her tattered ensign down!
Long has it waved on high,
And many an eye has danced to see
That banner in the sky.
Beneath it rung the battle shout
And burst the cannon's roar—
The meteor of the ocean air
Shall sweep the clouds no more.

Her deck, once red with heroes' blood,
Where knelt the vanquished foe,
When winds were hurrying o'er the flood
And waves were white below,
No more shall feel the victor's tread
Or know the conquered knee—
The harpies of the shore shall pluck
The eagle of the sea!

Oh, better that her shattered hulk
Should sink beneath the wave;
Her thunders shook the mighty deep,
And there should be her grave;
Nail to the mast her holy flag,
Set every threadbare sail,
And give her to the god of storms,
The lightning and the gale!

[Applause.]

That gem, sir, from the pen of dear old Doctor Holmes did much in the long ago to save the day and preserve intact "Old Ironsides." As I sat here to-day thinking about the contemplated action of our present Secretary my memory went back to that other time. It seemed like history repeating itself, and I wondered if our Naval Secretary—poor benighted man—had ever read that patriotic poem by one of America's most gifted authors. But no matter; suffice it now for me to say that from that day in the distant past down to the present more practical time no sacrilegious hand has ever been raised to strike a blow against "Old Ironsides." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this may be a practical age, but American sentiment is not dead, and it is well that there is enough left to arouse the people in protest against destroying in a most unpatriotic way the gallant old ship Constitution. If only a sentimental value is left of all her greatness, it is enough to save her, and it is a very beautiful sentiment, and one altogether creditable to the hearts of the American people. This sentiment fights our battles, wins our victories, and preserves our liberties. Sentiment—deep-rooted, patriotic sentiment—is the progressive life of every people, and I trust the day will never come in our land when it will slumber so soundly that an unsympathetic act of vandalism can not arouse it to protest and action and indignation. The doom of the Republic will be knelled when American sentiment dies. So, sir, I say that for sentimental and patriotic reasons the frigate Constitution must not be destroyed. No act of vandalism must ever profane "Old Ironsides." Her glorious ensign must never be hauled down. She is the most valuable relic historically, and the most priceless possession to-day, in the American Navy. No wonder the patriotic people of New England, and elsewhere, were grieved and shocked when they learned that the Secretary of the Navy, in the most matter-of-fact way, intended to have this historic old ship of war towed out to sea and shot at for a target—shot to death with American gunpowder and by the Navy she made possible and did so much to embellish. But it shall never happen—perish the thought—because I believe I voice the patriotic feelings of all true Americans everywhere when I say we shall never give up the ship—we shall never destroy "Old Ironsides." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am a friend of the Secretary of the Navy. I have no disposition to harshly criticise that distinguished official. I think in this matter that he has been, to say the least, indiscreet, and has mistaken the patriotic sentiments which animate the American people, especially when some object of their reverence is assailed. Hence I believe it is only necessary for us to suggest to him that we are opposed to the destruction of this good old ship in order to preserve her as a common heritage for future generations. And that is for us to do—our work and our duty. Let us then meet the expectations of the people of our country, and put into the naval appropriation bill a provision that will carry a small annual appropriation for the care and the maintenance of this venerable old ship Constitution, and that will end the doubts as to her future most effectually for all time to come.

And now, sir, I want to read another poem anent this matter. After I had introduced the resolution just read by the Clerk, my dear old friend, the good gray poet of Washington, a son of old Kentucky, and as gallant, as warm-hearted, and as lovable a man as ever lived—Col. John A. Joyce—inspired by the subject as his prototype, Oliver Wendell Holmes, was on a former and similar occasion, dashed off the following poem and sent it to me to read when this matter came up for discussion. I take great pleasure in reading it:

Spare, oh, spare, the Constitution;
Grand old battle ship of ours.
Let it live in song and story,
Festooned with the fairest flowers.

Leave it as an object lesson
To the children of this land,
Teaching loyalty and valor,
Lessons they must understand.

Hull and Prebel, Bainbridge, Stewart,
Fired thy guns in battle roar.
Slaughtered Albion's bravest sailors—
Sunk and drove them from our shore.

Congress true and patriotic
Will not let thy glory die;
But be "target" for all praising
Like the stars in yonder sky.

Once you fought on stormy ocean,
"Target" for the tyrant foe;
Must "Old Ironsides" be shattered,
Friendless in its age and woe?

No! Let it shine in Boston Harbor,
Down the ages, by the sea;
Veteran of our naval glory—
Emblem of our liberty!

[Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, all honor to Colonel Joyce. He is now, and always has been, a true poet and a pure patriot. And now a few words more, and I am done. I want to say, in conclusion, that I am a friend of the American Navy. I glory in its brilliant and illustrious achievements. In every war and on every sea its valor and its heroism have illumined the pages of American history. There is no blot on its heraldic shield. The patriotic soul of every school boy in America has been fired by the valor, the bravery, and the glory of our naval heroes. Their motto is, and was, and ever will be, "Don't give up the ship;" and we, the Representatives of the American peopl in Congress, reechoing that heroic and patriotic sentiment, send greetings to our constituencies, and notice to the Secretary of the Navy, that we won't give up the ship; that we won't sacrifice "Old Ironsides;" that we won't destroy the Constitution—the oldest and the grandest and the proudest ship that ever nailed her colors to the mast in all the glorious history of the American Navy. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. PAYNE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MACON. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. I understood the gentleman to say privately, a few minutes ago, that he had no objection to waiting until to-morrow morning before he continued his speech.

Mr. MACON. I said that to the chairman, in response to a question.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield now for a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. MACON. Yes; with the understanding that I may have the floor in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The understanding of the Chair is that the gentleman will have the floor the first thing in the morning.

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly. He has the floor in his own right, and, as I understand it, no one can deprive him of that right.

The CHAIRMAN. Will it be agreeable to the gentleman to yield at this time?

Mr. MACON. Certainly. I like to be accommodating when I can. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House resolution 42, relating to the distribution of the President's message, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report and the statement of the managers upon the part of this House, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa presents a conference report and asks unanimous consent for its present consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not understand the request. Is it just for the printing of the report?

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I ask for the present consideration of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report. Perhaps it would be well enough to have it read, and then the request submitted. If there be no objection, it will be read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, is it not usual for these conference reports to be printed and go over until the next day?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think the gentleman from Mississippi understood the proposition. It is to have the conference report read, subject to objection. Of course it would have to go over under the rule, and be printed in the RECORD, if objection is made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then it can come up to-morrow.

Mr. PAYNE. The proposition now is to have it read, subject to objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does that carry with it the request for present consideration?

Mr. HEPBURN. Not until after it is read.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and myself misunderstood it.

Mr. SULZER. It is to be read for information only.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reading of the report?

There was no objection.

The conference report was read. The conference report and statement are as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 480, an act supplemental to an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, and making appropriation for isthmian canal construction, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2 and 3 and from its amendment to the title of the bill.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

"That the two per cent bonds of the United States authorized by section eight of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June twenty-eighth, nineteen hundred and two, shall have all the rights and privileges accorded by law to other two per cent bonds of the United States, and every national banking association having on deposit, as provided by law, such bonds issued under the provisions of said section eight of said act approved June twenty-eighth, nineteen hundred and two, to secure its circulating notes, shall pay to the Treasurer of the United States, in the months of January and July, a tax of one-fourth of one per cent each half year upon the average amount of such of its notes in circulation as are based upon the deposit of said two per cent bonds; and such taxes shall be in lieu of existing taxes on its notes in circulation imposed by section fifty-two hundred and fourteen of the Revised Statutes."

And the Senate agree to the same.

W. P. HEPBURN,
SERENO E. PAYNE,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

W. B. ALLISON,
EUGENE HALE,
H. M. TELLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Statement of managers on the part of the House.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill H. R. 480, supplemental to an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, and making appropriation for isthmian canal construction, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and submitted in the accompanying conference report on the amendments of the Senate, namely:

On amendment numbered 1: The effect of this amendment is to restore in other language the provisions of the first section of the House bill.

Amendments numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 are merely verbal.

The seventh amendment strikes out the provision requiring persons appointed or employed by the President in connection with the construction or operation of the canal to furnish information to Congress, or either House of Congress, when called upon.

Amendment numbered 8 provides that the estimates submitted to Congress shall cover all annual salaries paid to persons employed on the work, excepting laborers and skilled laborers.

Amendment numbered 9 is merely verbal.

Amendment numbered 10 strikes out the provision authorizing the use of the moneys received in the ordinary course of business and from the operation of the Panama Railroad and property and rights appertaining thereto in defraying the expenses of such operation and maintenance without being covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The Senate recedes from its amendment to the title of the bill.

W. P. HEPBURN,
SERENO E. PAYNE,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman now asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the matter take the usual course. It will come up to-morrow morning, when the conference report is printed and in the hands of everybody.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would say that there is no material change in the bill from the form in which it passed the House. The substance of it is nearly the same.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no idea that I shall make any objection to its consideration to-morrow.

Mr. HEPBURN. There is a desire to get this matter finished, so that the funds can be moved down to the Isthmus as soon as possible. They are needed there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the gentleman will agree that going over until to-morrow will not hurt anything.

FRED M. CAMPBELL.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 41.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the widow of Fred M. Campbell, late a messenger, Doorkeeper's department of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to six months' pay at the rate of compensation received by him at the time of his death; and further sum, not exceeding $250, for funeral expenses, said amount to be paid out of the contingent fund.

The following amendments recommended by the committee were read:

In line 5, after the word "and," insert the article "a."

In line 7, after the word "expenses," insert the words "of said Fred M. Campbell."

In line 7 strike out the word "amount" and insert the word "amounts."

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman if this is the usual amount paid to employees?

Mr. CASSEL. This is the usual amount and the usual form in which payment is made to the employees of the House who have died.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

HENRY ROBINSON.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I also offer another privileged report of the same character from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 59.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the widow of Henry Robinson, late disbursing clerk of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to six months' pay at the rate of compensation received by him at the time of his death, and a further sum, not exceeding $250, on account of expenses of his last illness and his burial, said amounts to be paid out of the contingent fund.

The following amendment recommended by the committee was read:

In line 7 strike out the words "his last illness and burial" and insert the words "the funeral expenses of said Henry Robinson."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ISA BLACK.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 106.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the widow of Isa Black, late a doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to six months' pay at the rate of compensation received by him at the time of his death, and a further sum, not exceeding $250, on account of expenses of his last illness and his burial, said amounts to be paid out of the contingent fund.

The following amendments recommended by the committee were read:

In line 3 strike out the word "doorkeeper" and insert the word "messenger."

In line 6, before the word "expenses," insert the words "the funeral."

In lines 6 and 7 strike out the words "his last illness and burial" and insert the words "said Isa Black."

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

DANIEL P. HICKLING.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I have another privileged report of the same character from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 87.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Sarah A. Hickling, widow of Daniel P. Hickling, late locksmith of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to six months' salary as locksmith, and a further sum, not exceeding $250, to defray the expenses of the last illness and funeral of said Daniel P. Hickling.

The following amendments recommended by the Committee on Accounts were read:

In line 5, after the word "the" where it first occurs, insert the word "funeral."

In lines 6 and 7 strike out the words "the last illness and funeral of."

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I present the following resolution from the Committee on Accounts:

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 80.

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint an additional clerk to said committee to serve during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress, at the per diem compensation which in the aggregate shall equal the sum paid session committee clerks whose employment is provided for by law.

Mr. CASSEL. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that this is not an increase in the force of this committee. As I understand it, it is the same amount that they had last year.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for its present consideration?

Mr. CASSEL. If it is not a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. It does not provide for payment from the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, pending unanimous consent, I would like to ask the gentleman if this is a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. CASSEL. It is, and I think all the minority members were present this morning.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection.

The following amendment recommended by the Committee on Accounts was read, as follows:

In line 5, after the word "compensation," insert the words "of six dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

JANITOR TO COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills is hereby authorized to appoint a janitor to said committee room and to the engrossing room of the House, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $60 per month, during the present Congress, until otherwise provided for by law.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

LABORER IN LADIES' RECEPTION ROOM.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and he is hereby, empowered to employ a laborer in the ladies' reception room at a salary of $75 per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, and for the session only.

The Clerk read the following committee amendments:

In line 3 strike out "seventy-five" and insert "sixty."

In line 4 strike out the word "and."

In line 5 strike out the words "the session only" and insert the words "sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress;" so that it will read:

"At a salary of $60 per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House for the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is this the usual resolution?

Mr. CASSEL. This is a new appointment, to take charge of the new room which has been established on the minority side of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is this an additional clerk to the force carried last year?

Mr. CASSEL. No; it is a new janitor to take charge of the new room which has been established on the other side of the building as the ladies' reception room.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is this janitor to take care of this hallway out here in which there have been some chairs put? I think I shall object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it is a privileged resolution. The amount is payable from the contingent fund, which renders the resolution privileged.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like the gentleman to explain to the House the necessity for the new rule, if it is a new rule, and the additional force, if it is an additional force.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the room has been ordered equipped as a place where Members can receive visitors who come here from time to time to see them on business, and that it is especially a place where ladies can wait until a Member can see them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Where is the room?

Mr. CASSEL. It is directly beyond that door in the lobby.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, is it this hallway right here?

Mr. CASSEL. Yes; the hallway there which has been fitted up.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ever since I have been here people have sent in cards from there, ladies have come there when they wanted to, and they have been received there. It seems to me it is unnecessary to have a janitor in a hall where Members go out to see people who send in their cards to them.

Mr. CASSEL. Well, the room must be taken care of, and it has been recommended by the Doorkeeper of the House as a necessity, and was so presented to the Committee at its hearings.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is there necessary to be done there in order to take care of this hallway? It has always been swept up and kept in order since I have been here without any additional janitor.

Mr. CASSEL. Well, I am doubtful whether the room has been kept in proper condition for the visitors of the House to wait in from time to time, and it is nothing more than is customary in every other room in the House which has been equipped for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it not a fact that about the only change made is to place a table there and a few chairs?

Mr. CASSEL. I suppose it is; but there are more people gathering there at the present time than there were formerly, because they know it is a waiting place.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman if this is the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. CASSEL. It is the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Was the committee fully attended when it was reported?

Mr. CASSEL. Fully attended. I think there were eight members of the committee present at the meeting this morning, and it was considered very carefully and reported upon favorably by all of the members of the committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASSEL. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I think the House ought to have some knowledge of just what is proposed to be done by this resolution. One of the hallways opposite the entrance to this House on this side, during the past six years, the time that I have been a Member of the House, has been about the only place where the Members on this side could receive their friends while the House was in session. Through the activity of some official of the Capitol a half dozen chairs and a table have been placed in this corridor, and from time to time one or two Members of the Capitol police, in the performance of their duty, walk through that corridor to see that the Members of the minority do not conduct themselves in an improper manner while receiving friends. [Laughter.] With his eye upon the contingent fund of the House, and with a desire to place some constituent—no doubt a deserving one—some enterprising gentleman saw an opportunity to utilize the services of some man as a janitor in this corridor, which, if I am not mistaken, is under the control of the Capitol police.

What are the police in this Capitol for, I would like to know, if not to keep order in the corridors. To what extent are we to multiply the men paid from the contingent fund of the House? I am not one of those opposed to the employment of the necessary help proper in the conduct of the business of the House or necessary for the convenience of its Members, but I do hope that the House will not inaugurate a system of janitors for the corridors about this Capitol. This is an entering wedge, and I am astounded that any eight men from one committee should be able to come in here with a unanimous report in favor of such an absurd proposition. Why, Mr. Speaker, I would invite the Members of the House to go out and see just where they wish to place a janitor. It is about 20 feet from the door of the House to the outside door of the Capitol. There are, as I have said, perhaps a half dozen chairs and a table there, and to take care of that reception room it is proposed to put a janitor on the rolls of this House at the rate of $60 a month. I am not posing here as a rigid economist, yet I do not wish to be put in the position of being an "absurdist," if I can coin that word, and I hope that the House in the exercise of an intelligent discrimination will vote down this resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. CASSEL and Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASSEL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am very much surprised at the base ingratitude of the minority side of the House. The House sets apart a receiving room for the benefit of the minority and the members of the majority are required to see their friends in the hall, with no chairs and no table——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And no janitor.

Mr. MANN. But through the magnanimity of the House controlled by the majority we set apart a corridor, tables, and chairs, with opportunity for people to sit down, and then these people, when we wish to keep it clean, decline to have the place kept clean. [Laughter.] The majority side of the House would be glad for any opportunity to receive their friends without standing up in the halls, but the minority, I regret to say, seem to be full of ingratitude at the magnanimity which we display. [Laughter.] I have no doubt it is only the enterprising minority who believe in keeping this place in good order out here. We give you the best we have got, and still you kick. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield just a moment?

Mr. CASSEL. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, when I was a boy I was very familiar with a motto which hung on the wall of many homes. It was "God bless our home." Recalling that, I think we might properly say in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, "God bless the magnanimity of the majority of this House." [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, one more innocuous observation, suggested by the gentleman from Illinois. If this were a corridor provided for the use of the majority of the House instead of the minority, then, judging by recent political history, we could understand just precisely why it was strictly necessary to have somebody on the pay roll to keep it clean [laughter and applause]; but this is a corridor for the minority, which can very well take care of itself without this special cleaning service. As long as I have been here ladies have come here, Members have gone out to see them, and there never was this special janitor before, and I have never noticed anything out of order there. It seems to me that this is an unnecessary appropriation, but at the same time, if the spirit of the appropriation be as the gentleman from Illinois has indicated, I do not know but what it would be worth the amount of money to be taken out of the Treasury as a mere memorial [laughter] of the new and chivalrous manner in which we will be dealt with in the future. It might be well to offer an amendment providing that the same amount of money should be used for the erection of a memorial there, a small pedestal with a little bit of a statuette, let us say, of the Speaker of the House, with a scroll, and on it the words, "Fifty-ninth Congress; to the minority with the compliments of the majority." [Laughter and applause.] But if the only object is that there may be decency and order the minority does not need the janitor.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and there were on a division (demanded by Mr. CASSEL)—ayes 29, noes 53.

So the resolution was rejected.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

STENOGRAPHER FOR JOURNAL CLERK.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I offer another report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk is ordered to employ a stenographer to assist the Journal Clerk, at a compensation not exceeding $75 per month, during the sessions of this Congress.

With the following amendment: In line 2, after the word "Clerk," insert the words "out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided for by law."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee, if the present law does not prevent the payment of any salary out of the contingent fund of the House?

Mr. CASSEL. Well, I would say that there is a difference of opinion as to the meaning of that law, as to whether one Congress can control a contingent of another Congress, and that will be up to the officials of the Treasury Department to decide.

Mr. TAWNEY. The appropriation for the contingent fund of the House for the present fiscal year expressly provides that no part of it shall be used for the payment of salaries. I do not know anything about the necessity for the employment of this clerk, but I think that provision of the law is binding upon this House. I know that no resolution of the House can either expressly or by implication repeal any existing law. Of course the House has it in its power to provide the compensation for any person whose employment it authorizes. But that is the law, and it expressly provides that no part of that contingent fund shall be used for the payment of salaries.

Mr. PAYNE. If that is the law, why would not it take away the privilege of these resolutions to pay salaries out of the contingent fund of the House, and make it a matter of unanimous consent, at least?

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, as I said before this is a matter which will have to be decided by the Treasury Department as to the meaning of the law. There have been two or three different decisions given from time to time. The majority would say that no Congress can control a succeeding Congress in the expenditure of their contingent fund.

Mr. DALZELL. I would like to ask whether or not this is a new officer?

Mr. CASSEL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] can answer that question. It is not a new position, as I understand it, at all.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania ask unanimous consent to consider this resolution?

Mr. CASSEL. Yes; if necessary I ask unanimous consent. I do not believe it is necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

SESSION CLERKS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I also offer another report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That clerks to committees of the House during the session, provided for by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, be, and they are hereby, allowed and assigned for the present Congress to the following committees, namely:

To the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, a clerk.
To the Committee on Education, a clerk.
To the Committee on Enrolled Bills, a clerk.
To the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, a clerk.
To the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, a clerk.
To the Committee on the Militia, a clerk.
To the Committee on Mines and Mining, a clerk.
To the Committee on Patents, a clerk.
To the Committee on Railways and Canals, a clerk.
To the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, a clerk.
To the Committee on Invalid Pensions, an assistant clerk.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASSEL] yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH]?

Mr. CASSEL. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to know if any of these are new positions that are being created?

Mr. CASSEL. These are exactly the same appointments that were made a year ago by the House, and to the same committees. These eleven clerks are provided for by law, and the Committee on Accounts have the awarding of them to the different committees. The committees have followed the precedent of the last year's committee.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

STENOGRAPHER TO COMMITTEE ON REVISION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I have another resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws is hereby authorized to appoint a stenographer to said committee, to serve during the Fifty-ninth Congress, whose compensation shall be $6 per diem.

With an amendment, in line 5, after the word "the," to insert the words "sessions of the."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if this commission to revise the laws is a perpetual body or not?

Mr. CASSEL. It is a committee which has been appointed by the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it a House committee?

Mr. CASSEL. It is a House committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thought it said the "commission."

Mr. CASSEL. No, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to know what business that committee has before it this session. It is not usually overburdened with work.

Mr. CASSEL. I am told that they intend to take up and codify all the laws.

Mr. TAWNEY. As I understand it, that commission has not yet made its report.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is what I wanted to find out—when it is going to make its report.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am told that it is going to make its report some time during this Congress, but it has not yet been made.

Mr. CASSEL. I will call on the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON] to more fully answer concerning the matter.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, with reference to that, the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota is true, that the entire report has not yet been made by the commission. We have held two sessions of the committee, one of them this morning, and members of that commission have been before the committee at both sessions, and they told us that the completed report, the substantive law or the civil code, will be ready some time during the early spring, but that two sections of the law, to wit, the penal code and the judiciary code, are now ready to report. There has been presented to our committee in the past these two codes, and bills have been presented here for consideration, but no time has ever yet been allowed for that purpose. The important and responsible duty is imposed upon us at this time to present these bills.

Now, we already have before us, practically in the form of a bill, the judiciary code and the penal code. These require examination and a large amount of work on the part of this committee. It is not necessary for me now to occupy the time to tell you or to go into all the details, but the work is all of great importance.

It has been reported, and we must verify it all; we must pass upon it, examine it, and probably draw new sections and amend it to a very important extent. This is the present work of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and I think no committee of the House can have a larger amount of work devolving upon it at the present time than has this committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. Now, this Commission to revise the laws is nothing but a codification commission, is it?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Well, it is practically a codification committee, and at the same time it is something very much more.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is not a legislative committee?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Only in the sense that where the law has been changed and where an amendment is necessary to the law in order to make a complete law the duties of this Commission require it to make those amendments and to report new enactments when necessary for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Wait a minute now.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Permit me to answer.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. An amendment necessary in your opinion?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Or in the opinion of the Commission. I can not go into details. But there are numerous cases where the laws have been abrogated or rescinded, and there does not exist a coherent scheme of law on that subject. That omission has frequently been found, and the Commission consider it their duty, where this condition exists, to supply all such omissions, and there were a great many of them, I can assure the gentleman, in the report thus far made.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, when your committee goes to work on this report of the revisionists, if that is the proper term, then you revise their work, do you?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Well, we must examine it, pass upon it, and revise it before we can bring it to the House for consideration.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then Congress has got to go to work to reenact this whole business, has it?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. There is no other method by which this work can be done.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then I would like to know what was the sense of appointing this Commission at all.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. In reply to the gentleman from Missouri, I would say that it does not seem to me that it would be possible for a committee of this House to have ever performed the voluminous labor that has devolved upon this Commission. There has been no revision of the laws since 1874, or, to be more accurate, since 1878. In 1874 there was a revision, but that revision was so incomplete and so imperfect that it was suppressed. There were found to be hundreds of mistakes, and a commissioner, Mr. Boutwell of Massachusetts, was appointed to revise the revision, and therefore the revision of 1878 practically took the place of the suppressed revision of 1874, because the work was not thoroughly done by the Commission, not exhaustively examined by the committee, and not carefully scrutinized by this House.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. This revisory commission submits its report by chapters to your committee, does it not?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. The bill requires it to submit its report as a whole, unfortunately. It never has submitted chapters. If the gentleman will permit me to answer, it has submitted two titles, that upon the penal code and that upon the judiciary code, but the bill really requires it to be presented as a whole.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The law creating the revisory commission?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Now, they submit their report in typewriting to your committee, do they not?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. No; in print.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. In print. Then your committee proposes to take that up chapter by chapter and go over it?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. And you will make your report, as I suppose, to the House by chapters. Is that the purpose?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. No; by titles, really. We are going to make it as a whole; but it would be impossible ever to ask this House to sit continuously to consider 10,000 sections of the law, which there will be in this complete report. Therefore, it is our purpose now to bring in first the title of the penal code, which will cover something short of 500 sections; secondly, the title of the judiciary. That is the present plan; not by chapters, but by titles.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Now, I want to ask you this additional question: Has your committee a clerk and a stenographer already?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. It has a clerk, but not a stenographer.

Mr. TAWNEY. A session clerk or an annual clerk?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. An annual clerk; and the duties of that clerk are serious. We propose to divide that committee into subcommittees, as you can readily understand we must do. The clerk that I have to that committee is a lawyer, and I hope to get a great deal of aid and assistance from him in comparing the revision with the existing law. He will be expected to render service to these subcommittees whenever such service is required. It seems to me that in the progress of this work the committee needs the assistance of a stenographer.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I beg to submit this additional remark, that I have very considerable apprehension that the work of your committee will not be so great as you now think it will be, because I apprehend that the revisory commission is not going to dump very much down on you before this session of Congress adjourns.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Well, we had an assurance this morning from the Commission of an early report. We have had them before us twice, and I want to say on behalf of the committee that we have been very imperative in demanding of them speedy action.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. We have been having it a good while now.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. We are not unmindful of the fact that this Congress at its last session practically placed the absolute responsibility of this matter upon our shoulders, with the understanding that otherwise there would be a bill introduced to abolish this revisory Commission.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is aware, I suppose, that the House provides a corps of committee stenographers, some one of whom will be at the service of the gentleman's committee at almost any time.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I am not aware of that. I will say in response to the gentleman that I have not had sufficient experience here to know that fact. Most of you know that this is my first experience as a committee chairman.

Mr. MANN. I think every Member of the House is perfectly willing to give the gentleman's committee every opportunity to make a report upon the revision of the laws. The gentleman proposes to have a stenographer to the committee at the rate of $6 a day.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The House now pays its committee stenographers at the rate of $5,000 a year, I believe, and they ought to be better stenographers.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I did not understand that they were available for this work.

Mr. MANN. There are four committee stenographers.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I submit to the gentleman's superior knowledge.

Mr. MANN. And these gentlemen are at the disposition of the committees of the House. I dare say the gentleman would have no difficulty at all in having one of these stenographers at his service almost any time, both during the sessions of the House, if his committee has leave to sit, and before the session of the House commences any day. Now, of course, if the gentleman's committee needs an extra clerk, that is another thing, but so far as the work of a stenographer is concerned, the gentlemen of this committee can do what the other committees of the House do, send word downstairs that they want a committee stenographer, and they will get one.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois knows full well that the committee stenographers are employed by various committees having hearings before them, and they are constantly engaged from the beginning to the close of the session, and if this committee, in the codification or making up of the report they are required to make up, need a stenographer, the committee stenographers being otherwise engaged, they would have to bring in some one from the outside, and the expense would be a great deal more than to employ a regular stenographer.

Mr. MANN. Oh, my distinguished friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, assumes that the committee stenographers are busy all the time. That is a violent assumption, and is not the case.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the Committee on Ways and Means about half the time has an outside stenographer, because the committee stenographers claim to be busy when we send for them.

Mr. MANN. I have often defended these stenographers on the floor of the House when the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from New York were attacking them. We frequently have two of these stenographers in our committee at the same time, and if they are so busy it seems to me that we might get along with one instead of having two reporting the same thing at the same time.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, that may account for it; there may be two stenographers in the room of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and when we want one in the Committee on Ways and Means we have to take an outsider. I know that the bills before our committee are simply enormous for outside work. I think these bills would pay $6 a day for a long time for a stenographer for this committee. As far as this committee is concerned I think it is a question whether they need this additional clerk at the present time. It is not for what they have now, but what they expect and hope to have in the future. I do not see why this thing should not go over until they get that large number of chapters from the commission for consideration before that committee, and then if they need the additional clerk the House will vote for it.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman pardon me? Does not the gentleman from New York think that the Committee on Ways and Means is likely to have more use for a stenographer than the Committee on the Revision of the Laws?

Mr. PAYNE. I think so. So far as the Committee on Ways and Means is concerned, I think it would be cheaper for the House to employ one at $6 a day than to pay the bills that we have to pay.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from New York, respecting the work now before the committee, while, strictly speaking, there is not any report before the committee, but conscious of the important amount that will come before it immediately after the holidays, we are proceeding to examine the previous reports presented by the Commission, particularly upon the subject of the penal statutes that was before the last committee. We have had the assurance of the Commission that very few changes have been made in it, only supplying a few omissions and bringing it down by incorporating the laws passed at the last Congress, and therefore we are at present at work——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What is the stenographer going to do?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. When four subcommittees are at work going over the matter reported to the committee, amendments will be suggested, and there may be considerable dictation to that stenographer. There will be practically four committees at work at the same time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman's committee is going to receive a revised title from this Commission upon which the members of the Commission have spent a number of years' work. Does his committee then intend to hold hearings?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Not hearings in the sense of bringing witnesses before it, but a careful examination of all the work, and an examination of the previous statutes, and an examination of all the changes and amendments that are proposed, and an examination of new law that is submitted will involve considerable labor and dictation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It seems to me that what the committee needs is a good lawyer and not a stenographer.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Oh, we are vain enough to think that we have one or two of them on the committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to this fact. I do not recall how long the Commission has been in existence, but last July a well-known law-book concern issued an invitation to Members of Congress to purchase a set of the Federal Statutes, revised and annotated. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania any knowledge of how this law-publishing concern was able to get this out so quickly while our Commission has been dragging along for so many years?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I do not think the gentleman expects me to answer that question. Of course I have no knowledge, and do not know to what revised edition the advertisement alludes.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote on the proposition.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASSEL] has the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, but what is it he is trying to do?

The SPEAKER. To get a vote.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to say a word about this subject of the revision of the laws.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASSEL. I will yield for a short time. I am in no hurry myself, but there is other business before the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I either want the time now or want this thing to go over until morning.

Mr. CASSEL. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not want over five minutes.

Mr. CASSEL. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that Congress ever intended that the men who were appointed to revise the laws—and I am not talking about this committee of the House—should ever resolve itself into a legislative body. All that Congress ever intended that those three distinguished gentlemen, drawing $5,000 a year each for nine years, should do was to codify the laws of Congress, and at the rate they are going now we will die of old age before we ever get a codification of the laws. Another thing. If they come in here and report a lot of new laws, and then the committee of which my friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON] is chairman is to go through those laws and report them back to the House and we have then to consider every one of them, you could not read those 10,000 sections in this House to save your life in two sessions of this Congress. So we are just exactly now where we were in February, 1897, when Congress passed the law to appoint these three revisers to draw $5,000 a year each for the purpose of codifying the laws.

I do not mind giving this committee this stenographer if it needs it; but if we are ever going to have a revision of those laws I want it in this Congress, and I want the revisers, if that is the proper title to give them, to be restricted to the simple office of codificaion. They may be great lawyers, but they are not legislators. They were appointed to find out what the laws are and to get them together in a convenient form, so that people can consult them conveniently and expeditiously, and if they go on in the way they have been going they will succeed each other in perpetuity and that committee on revision will last as long as the Congress of the United States lasts. Unless they bring in that revision before this session closes, I intend to move that they be discharged and their salaries be cut off.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, Mr. Speaker, I understand there was an agreement last Congress that that course would be taken if they did not report.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. That is true. I may say that when we came in here at the last session of Congress—some one from our committee, I think the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]—to ask that the Commission be permitted to report the three portions of the law at the same time, viz, the penal code, the judiciary title, and the civil code, this House then raised that question. All that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has so well said was said then. I have no argument to make against his reasonable demand. The agreement was entered into, or the statement was made, that unless that Commission were prepared to report during this session—and, indeed, I think they said the earlier part of this session—a bill would be introduced abolishing the Commission; and I only want to say that the Committee upon the Revision of the Laws, mindful of this injunction of the House, have had that Commission before them twice already and have stated in no uncertain terms their intention to put into force that pledge that was made to the House. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

COUNCIL CITY AND SOLOMON RIVER RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 99) to aid the Council City and Solomon River Railroad Company, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the bill in full.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MCNARY. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for batteries at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting a draft of a legislative provision relating to the sale of down timber and hay in the Chippewa, of the former Indian reservation in Minnesota—to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the report of the astronomical investigation of the Texas, New Mexico, and Oklahoma boundary lines—to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of the Sacramento and San Joaquin and Feather rivers, California—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of the Mississippi River Commission and a board of engineers of a survey of a 14-foot waterway from Lockport, Ill., to St. Louis, Mo.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. BABCOCK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 71) requiring the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to prepare a report upon the improvement of the Anacostia River Flats, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 9); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Under clause 2, Rule XIII, adverse reports were delivered to the Clerk, and laid on the table, as follows:

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 77) requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish information relative to deposits of public money, etc., reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 8); which said resolution and report were ordered laid on the table.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. THOMAS of Ohio: A bill (H. R. 9299) providing for the promotion of warrant officers, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. WALLACE: A bill (H. R. 9300) to annex the Choctaw and Cherokee nations of the Indian Territory to the State of Arkansas—to the Committee on the Territories.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9301) to destroy Bayou Bartholomew as a navigable stream in the State of Arkansas—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9302) authorizing the State of Arkansas to fix its western boundary—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9303) to regulate the practice, pleadings, forms, and mode of proceeding in civil causes in equity in the circuit courts of the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BABCOCK: A bill (H. R. 9304) to extend the public alley in block 23, subdivision known as Columbia Heights, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. SIMS: A bill (H. R. 9305) authorizing the extension of Meridian place NW.—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. BURKE of South Dakota: A bill (H. R. 9306) to authorize the sale of a portion of the Lower Brule Indian Reservation, in South Dakota, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SHERMAN: A bill (H. R. 9307) to enable the Indians on the La Pointe or Bad River Reservation to obtain title to the lots occupied by them in the village of Odanah, Wis., and to have said village surveyed, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9308) to amend the act of Congress approved February 11, 1901, entitled "An act providing for allotments of lands in severalty to the Indians of the La Pointe or Bad River Reservation, in the State of Wisconsin"—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. FLACK: A bill (H. R. 9309) for the erection of a public building at Rouses Point, N. Y.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. FOSTER of Vermont: A bill (H. R. 9310) to increase the pay of letter carriers on rural free-delivery routes—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. STANLEY: A bill (H. R. 9311) to establish a fish-hatching and fish-culture station in Christian County, in southwestern Kentucky—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. CURTIS: A bill (H. R. 9312) giving authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to consolidate and reorganize the customs districts, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SMITH of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 9313) for the erection of a public building at Indiana, Pa.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9314) for the erection of a public building at Clarion, Pa.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9315) for the erection of a public building at Kittanning, Pa.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9316) for the erection of a public building at Brookville, Pa.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

I move that the statement be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

GRAVES OF CONFEDERATE DEAD.

Mr. FORAKER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1234) to provide for the appropriate marking of the graves of the soldiers and sailors of the Confederate army and navy who died in northern prisons and were buried near the prisons where they died, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

MESSENGER FOR COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL EXPOSITIONS.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by himself on the 19th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on Industrial Expositions be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of $1,440 per annum, until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. SPOONER. I am moved partly from curiosity and partly, I think, with some reference to public duty, to inquire of the Senator from New Jersey, the chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, how many committees of the Senate there are left that have not messengers? Some such resolution, I think, comes on every day, and seems to pass nem. con. I endeavored in the beginning to stem the tide, but it was an impossibility. If there are any committees left which have not messengers, why not supply them and thereby rid ourselves of this daily treat?

Mr. HALE. That is the intention.

Mr. KEAN. That is the intention of this resolution. This is only one. I believe there are three other committees that have not messengers.

Mr. SPOONER. What committees are they?

Mr. KEAN. The Committee on the Potomac River Front and the Committee on National Banks, and possibly one other.

Mr. SPOONER. That leads me to inquire of the Senator from New Jersey why this discrimination?

Mr. KEAN. The Senator from New Jersey has no intention to discriminate——

Mr. SPOONER. I know it.

Mr. KEAN. But the Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] has been very anxious that the Select Committee on Industrial Expositions should have a messenger, and it has been done, and I think very properly done.

Mr. SPOONER. Not to do it would be a discrimination.

Mr. KEAN. I think it would, and I do not want to discriminate in anyone's favor or against anyone.

I will say further that in the reorganization of the committees of the Senate two committees that did have messengers were dropped, and therefore this is no increase whatever in the messenger force or in the expenses of the contingent fund.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator does not mean that the messengers were dropped, but the committees were dropped?

Mr. KEAN. The committees were dropped and that dropped the messengers. Both the messengers and the clerks to the committees were dropped.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the Senator has no doubt that the other two or three committees will strike the surface before long. Will they not?

Mr. KEAN. They will be on hand; they are already.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will hear them?

Mr. KEAN. I expect to do so in a very short time.

Mr. HALE. I hope so.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the Calendar of General Orders is in order.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, before the Calendar is proceeded with, as reflecting on the present state of the law with respect to the regulation of railway rates. I desire to have printed in the RECORD two or three documents.

The first is an article from the Washington Post of December 13, 1905, giving the order recently issued by the Attorney-General to the district attorneys of the United States, directing them to institute proceedings to prevent and punish rebates. If there is no objection, I shall simply ask that it may be incorporated without reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The paper referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Post, December 13, 1905.]

TO BREAK UP REBATES—SPECIAL ORDERS ISSUED TO DISTRICT ATTORNEYS—MOODY GIVES INSTRUCTIONS—FEDERAL OFFICIALS DIRECTED TO START INVESTIGATION OF COMPLAINTS—WHERE EVIDENCE WARRANTS OFFENDERS ARE TO BE INDICTED FOR CONSPIRACY—SHIPPER AND CARRIER ARE BOTH TO BE PROSECUTED.

A sweeping order to all Federal district attorneys in the United States has been sent out by Attorney-General Moody, with a view of breaking up the practice of railroad rebates. The attorneys are directed to act upon their own initiative without waiting for specific directions from the Attorney-General. Furthermore, they are instructed to prosecute for conspiracy and for punishment by imprisonment instead of by fine whenever possible.

The letter of the Attorney-General, which bears date of December 8, follows:

"An act entitled 'To further regulate commerce among foreign nations and among the States,' approved February 19, 1903 (32 Stats., 847), commonly known as the 'Elkins Act,' is directed against rebates and other discriminatory practices by common carriers. It makes such practices misdemeanors and provides for their punishment by fines. It further provides for their prohibition by the unjunctive process of the courts. There is no provision that criminal prosecution shall be by the special direction of the Attorney-General, but in section 3 it is provided that proceedings for injunction shall be begun 'whenever the Attorney-General shall direct.'

TO INVESTIGATE COMPLAINTS.

"You are directed diligently to investigate all complaints which may come to you from any source of violation of this law, and, upon your own initiative, to make investigations if there appears to you to be any reasonable ground for suspecting violations of this law. In every case in which you can secure sufficient evidence you will submit that evidence to the grand jury with a view to securing an indictment. Whenever it is practicable it is desirable that indictments should be returned both against the shipper and the carrier. In some cases, however, it may be impossible to obtain sufficient evidence without the aid of the testimony of one of the guilty parties to the transaction. In such a case it would be wise to use such testimony, of course, affording to the witness or witnesses immunity from prosecution.

"Under the Elkins law the only penalty for its violation is a fine. I suggest to you, in all cases where the evidence would warrant it, that an indictment for conspiracy to commit an offense against the United States, based upon section 5440 of the Revised Statutes, be obtained.

RULING OF SUPREME COURT.

"The Supreme Court has held, in Clune v. United States (159 U. S., 590, 595), that a conspiracy to commit a crime, itself punishable only by fine, may be punished by imprisonment. In the event of obtaining a conviction upon a charge of this kind you are directed to present to the court the desirability of inflicting the penalty of imprisonment, to the end that these unlawful practices, which have received almost universal condemnation, may be discouraged and prevented as far as existing laws will accomplish that result.

"Your attention is especially directed to that part of the act which renders unlawful 'any rebate, concession, discrimination in the respect of the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce * * * whereby any such property shall, by any device whatever, be transported at a less rate than that of the tariffs published and filed.'

"I desire to impress upon you the importance of using every effort to execute these directions. You will report to the Department from time to time any action which you may have taken upon this subject."

Mr. FORAKER. I offer, in the second place, a decision rendered on the 20th day of November, 1905, by Judge Bethea, of the United States circuit court for the eastern division of the northern district of Illinois, in a very celebrated case, brought at the instance of the Interstate Commerce Commission against a large number of railroads, to test the question as to whether or not there was discrimination against live stock shipped from points on the Missouri and other points to Chicago as against the dressed product. I ask that that may be incorporated in the RECORD. It is a very long opinion. I shall not take the time now to read it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD.

The paper referred to is as follows:

1. The act to regulate commerce—Its objects.—The principal objects of the interstate commerce act were to secure just and reasonable rates; to prohibit unjust discriminations in the rendition of like service, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions; to prevent undue or unreasonable preference to persons, corporations, or localities; to inhibit greater compensation for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line; and to abolish combinations for the pooling of freight.

2. Same—Same—Competition.—The act to regulate commerce was not designed to prevent competition between different roads, but rather to encourage it.

3. Section 1 of the act to regulate commerce.—Section 1 of the act to regulate commerce requires that all charges made for the transportation of property shall be reasonable; and the evidence shows that the rates in controversy in these cases are reasonable.

4. Same—Factors to be considered in fixing reasonable rates—Value of service to the shipper.—There are a great many factors and circumstances to be considered in fixing rates; and, among other things, is the value of the service to the shipper, which includes the value of the goods and the profits which the shipper can make by having them transported from one point to another. The evidence and authorities in the cases show that this method of rate making is not only ideal but practical when not interfered with by competition; and it is based on an idea similar to taxation. Case cited: I. C. C. v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 43 Fed. Rep., pp. 37, 53.

5. Same—Same—Cost of service to the carrier.—The evidence shows that the cost of service to the carrier would be an ideal theory for rate making; but it is not practical. Such cost can be reached approximately, but not accurately enough to make this factor controlling. It is, however, worthy of consideration and is a very important factor. Cases cited: I. C. C. v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 43 Fed. Rep., pp. 37, 53; Ransome v. E. C. Ry. Co. (1857), 1 C. B., p. 437; 26 L. J. C. P., p. 91; Judson on Interstate Commerce, sections 148, 149; W. U. Tel. Co. v. Call Pub. Co., 181 U. S., p. 92; D. G. H. & M. R. R. Co. v. I. C. C., 167 U. S., p. 633.

6. Same—Same—Weight, bulk, and convenience of transportation.—The weight and bulk of the article to be transported, and the convenience or inconvenience to the carrier in transporting it, may be considered in rate making.

7. Same—Same—The amount of the product or commodity offered for transportation.—The fact that there is a large amount of a product or commodity in the hands of a few persons under almost one control, which is offered for shipment at stated intervals, in fixed and continuous quantities, may be considered in rate making; thus recognizing the principle of selling cheaper at wholesale than at retail. Case cited: I. C. C. v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 145 U. S., pp. 263–272.

8. Same—Same—The general public good.—The general public good may be considered in rate making. This includes the welfare and advantage of the great body of the citizens of the United States, who constitute the producers, shippers, and consumers; and it also includes the welfare and advantage of the various localities, and of the common carriers. Case cited: I. C. C. v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 145 U. S., p. 263; see also T. & P. Ry. v. I. C. C., 162 U. S., pp. 218–219.

9. Same—Same—Competition.—Competition may be considered in rate making. The authorities, as well as the experts in these cases, recognize that competition may be a controlling factor. Cases cited: Pickering, Phipps & Co. v. L. & N. W. Ry. Co., 2 Q. B. D. (1892), p. 229; I. C. C. v. B. & O. R. R. Co., p. 263; C. N. O. & T. P. Ry. v. I. C. C., 162 U. S., p. 184; I. C. C. v. Ala. Midland Ry. Co., 168 U. S., p. 164; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Behlmer, 175 U. S., p. 648; E. T. V. & G. Ry. v. I. C. C., 181 U. S., p. 1; T. & P. Ry. Co. v. I. C. C., 162 U. S., p. 197; I. C. C. v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 190 U. S., p. 273.

10. Same—Same—No one of the above factors is alone controlling.—None of the above factors alone are considered as necessarily controlling. Neither are all of them controlling as a matter of law. It is a question of fact, to be decided by the proper tribunal in each case as to what is controlling. In every case the Supreme Court has held that competition may be controlling. In only one case has it, as a matter of fact, been held not to be a defence.

11. Section 3 of the act to regulate commerce—Its objects.—The object of section 3 of the act to regulate commerce was to prevent undue preference or advantage to any person, company, firm, corporation, or locality or any particular description of traffic.

12. Same—Same—Undue or unreasonable preference or advantage.—The statute does not define the phrase "undue or unreasonable preference or advantage." Whether a preference or advantage is "undue" or "unreasonable" must be determined by the circumstances of each case.

13. Same—Same—Inequality of charge.—Mere inequality of charge does not constitute undue or unreasonable preference or advantage. Railroads are only bound to give the same terms to all persons alike, under the same conditions and circumstances; and any fact which produces an inequality of conditions and a change of circumstances justifies an inequality of charge. Case cited: I. C. C. v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 145 U. S., p. 372.

14. Same—Same—Same.—It is proper under the third section to give a preference or advantage or to discriminate between persons, localities, or traffics, provided such preference, advantage, or discrimination be not undue or unreasonable. Cases cited: I. C. C. v. Ala. Midland Ry., 168 U. S., p. 144; C., N. O. & T. P. Ry. v. I. C. C., 162 U. S., p. 184.

15. Same—Same—Same.—In passing upon the question of undue or unreasonable preference or advantage, it is not only legitimate but proper to take into consideration, besides the mere differences in charges, various elements, such as the convenience of the public, the fair interest of the carrier, the relative quantities or volume of the traffic involved, the relative cost of the services and profit to the company, and the situation and circumstances of the respective customers with reference to each other, as competitive or otherwise. Case cited: I. C. C. v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 43 Fed. Rep., p. 37; affirmed, 155 U. S., p. 263.

16. Same—Same—Same—Competition.—In considering the question of undue or unreasonable preference or advantage prohibited by the third section, competition may be considered. Cases cited: E. T., V. & G. Ry. Co. v. I. C. C., 181 U. S., p. 1; I. C. C. v. Ala. Midland Ry. Co., 168 U. S., p. 144; Judson on Interstate Commerce Law, sections 175 to 183; I. C. C. v. Atlantic Ry. Co. et al., 93 Fed. Rep., p. 83.

17. Same—Same—Same—Originating competition.—Even if one of the defendants (the C. G. W. Ry. Co.) had originated the competition in these cases it would be immaterial. Why a defendant can not begin the competition is not apparent. Some one must begin, and why not a defendant, if it is losing the business. A contrary construction would discourage competition, which the act to regulate commerce, as well as the antitrust act, was intended to encourage. Cases cited: E. T., V. & G. Ry. Co. v. I. C. C., 181 U. S., p. 1; I. C. C. v. Southern Ry Co., 105 Fed Rep., 703.

18. Same—Same—Same—Distinction between originating competition and reducing rates.—The C. G. W. Ry. Co., by its contract of August 8, 1902, reduced the rates on live-stock products, but it did not originate the competition in those products.

That competition was going on between these different defendants and other railroad companies with which said contract was made. Each company was striving to get what business it could; and the C. G. W. Ry. Co. reduced the rates in order to get its share of the traffic for which all of defendants had been and were then actively competing.

19. Same—Same—Same—Reduction of rates—When not voluntary.—The reduction of rates made by the C. G. W. Ry. was forced upon it, as it could not otherwise have continued to successfully compete for the business. Said reduction therefore was not "voluntary" on its part, within the meaning of the law. Case cited: E. T., V. & G. Ry. Co. v. I. C. C., 181 U. S., p. 1.

20. Same—Same—Same—Distinction between "real" and "possible" competition.—The fact that defendants might, if they choose to do so, bring about a severe competition in live stock, as in its products, is immaterial. It is sufficient that real and substantial competition is not as severe in live stock as in its products; and it is useless to inquire whether it might be possible to make competition as severe in the one case as in the other. Case cited: I. C. C. v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 190 U. S., p. 273.

21. Same—Same—Same—Particular description of traffic.—The construction of the phrase "undue or unreasonable preference or advantage" when applied to "any particular description of traffic" must be the same as when applied to "any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality." All of said terms are contained in a single sentence of the third section, and the same construction must be given to all of the sentence that is given to a part of it.

22. Section 3 of the "Elkins Act," approved February 19, 1903.—Section 3 of the "Elkins Act" provides a remedy in court, without going before the Interstate Commerce Commission, for any discriminations forbidden by law, including the discriminations or preferences prohibited by sections 1 and 3 of the act to regulate commerce.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

Case No. 27723 was brought by the Interstate Commerce Commission against the above-named defendants, under sections 1 and 3 of the interstate-commerce act of 1887, on the 26th day of April, 1905. In that case a petition was filed before the Commission, on March 31, 1902, and a hearing was commenced on January 22, 1903, wherein the testimony of about twenty witnesses was taken. As the result of that hearing, an order was entered by the Commission on the 7th day of January, 1905, that, in accordance with a report and opinion of the Commission in said matter, the relation of rates then maintained and enforced by said defendants in that certain territory described in the petition, whereby their rates for transportation were higher on live cattle and live hogs than upon dressed meats or prepared products of cattle and hogs, on the shipments thereof to Chicago, in the State of Illinois, from points on the Missouri River, Sioux City, in the State of Iowa, to Kansas City, in the State of Missouri, inclusive, and from South St. Paul, in the State of Minnesota, or from points in the territory between the Missouri River or South St. Paul and Chicago, constituted a wrongful prejudice and discrimination in violation of the provisions of the act to regulate commerce; and that said defendants, and each of them, were notified and required to cease and desist on or before the 15th day of February, 1905, from maintaining or enforcing the said unlawful relation of rates, and from further continuing said unlawful prejudice and discrimination.

Proper notice was served upon the defendants, and they refused to obey said order. Thereafter this proceeding was begun in this court.

On the 17th day of July, 1905, the Interstate Commerce Commission began suit No. 27829 against the above-named defendants, under section 3 of an act to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States, which took effect February 19, 1903, and known as the "Elkins Act."

Answers were filed by the defendants therein, in each case, and issue joined on or before the 15th day of September, 1905, at which time the above-named interveners filed their petitions for intervention, and issue was joined upon them. Pleas of former suit pending were filed and overruled. An order was then entered in this court combining the two causes.

The prayer of the petitions in these suits is substantially the same, the object in the first suit being to enforce the order of the Commission, and in the second suit to require a discontinuance of the discrimination alleged in said petition. The substance of the allegations of the two petitions is that the defendants were common carriers from the Missouri River and St. Paul to Chicago; that before August 8, 1902, the published rates of the defendants as to fresh meats and packing-house products from the Missouri River and St. Paul to Chicago were the same as were the rates on live cattle and hogs from the same points to Chicago; that upon the mentioned date, the defendant, The Chicago Great Western Railway Company, made a contract with certain owners of packing houses in Kansas City, St. Joseph, and other Missouri River points, in consideration of receiving a certain percentage of their business for seven years; that for that period the said railway company would transport from the Missouri River points and St. Paul to Chicago fresh meats and packing-house products at the following rates:

and that at that time, and since, the local rates on live cattle and hogs from said points to Chicago were as above set forth. And they further charge that such condition of rates had existed from that time until the filing of these petitions; that said rates were unreasonable under section 1 of the interstate-commerce act; and the result of such condition of rates was that under sections 3 of the interstate-commerce act, and of the Elkins Act, the defendants were committing an unlawful discrimination against said live cattle and live hogs, the shippers thereof, and the locality of Chicago, and thereby giving an undue and unreasonable preference or advantage to the traffic of fresh meats and packing-house products over said live cattle and hogs.

The Chicago Great Western Railway Company generally denied the violations of the law and set up that the rates were reasonable and gave no undue advantage; that they were caused by competition and justified by the cost of service, and that the order of the Commission was illegal.

The other defendants denied said charges in their answers and claimed, among other things, (1) that the said rates for live cattle and hogs were unreasonably low; (2) that there was not undue or unjust prejudice or advantage under section 3, because there was no relation or similarity between the traffic in fresh meats and packing-house products on the one hand and live cattle and hogs on the other, nor was there undue preference of any kind; (3) that when the cost of service was considered it was reasonable to carry the dressed meats and packing-house products cheaper than the live stock; (4) that packing-house products and fresh meats did not compete in any market with the live stock; (5) that when the commercial necessity of the situation was considered there was no undue prejudice against live stock in the rates; (6) that while the value of the service to the producer of the fresh meats and packing-house products was greater than that to the shipper of live stock, yet the risk of its carriage was very much less; (7) that the rate given to the producer of the packing-house products and fresh meats was caused by necessary competition; (8) that the complainant before the Commission had no interest in the business and no right to complain; (9) that the contract made by the Chicago Great Western Railway Company with the packers prevents the raising of the price of the products of the packers, and that the railroads could not be forced to lower live-stock rates. The interveners filed their petitions objecting to the prayer of the original petitions, and setting out facts tending to show injury to them.

Upon these issues testimony was taken in open court on most of the days from September 15, 1905, to October 14, 1905, and over forty witnesses were examined, and all but four were witnesses who had not been before the Commission. The testimony taken before the Commission was admitted in evidence, and portions of it read to the court, and all of it considered by the court.

The Commission came to certain conclusions as to the facts that are fully set forth in their opinion in the case found in 10 I. C. C. R., 428, which findings of fact the court assumed in the beginning of this hearing and in his consideration of the case to be the real facts in the case, as required by the statute. The court also considers the conclusions of the Commission to be the proper conclusions unless overcome by other testimony produced upon the hearing, although perhaps not required to do so.

The testimony taken before the court was in part to the following effect:

1. Upon the question as to whether the rates upon live cattle and hogs from Missouri River points and St. Paul to Chicago were reasonable or unreasonable, witnesses for the defendants, George H. Crosby, freight traffic manager of the C., B. & Q. Railroad Company; William A. Gardner, general manager C. & N. W. Ry Co.; William E. Keepers, general freight agent of the northerp and western lines of I. C. R. R.; Fletcher C. Rice, general inspector of transportation for the C., B. & Q. R. R.; J. H. Hiland, 3d vice-president C., M. & St. P. Ry. Co.; R. M. Calkins, assistant general freight agent C., M. & St. P. Ry. Co.; J. N. Tittemore, freight traffic manager of the Minneapolis and St. Louis Railroad and the Iowa Central Railroad; A. B. Stickney, president of The Chicago Great Western Railway Company; George E. Simpson, superintendent of transportation C., M. & St. P. Ry.; Harry Gower, assistant freight traffic manager C., R. I. & P. Ry. Co.; John M. Daley, Illinois Central Railroad car accountant, and H. R. McCullough, 3rd vice-president, C. & N. W. Ry. Co., testified that such rates were not only reasonable but were too low. Edward P. Ripley, president A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co., and James Peabody, statistician for said company, also testified that such rates were too low; T. W. Tomlinson and five or six shippers testified on the part of the Commission that such rates were unreasonably high.

2. Upon the question of the comparative cost of the service to the carriers in carrying dressed meat and packing-house products and live cattle and hogs, a great deal of testimony was taken on both sides. This subject was gone into by experts far more fully than had ever been done before. Many of the above witnesses on the part of the defendants made complete and accurate statements of the different items that they thought ought to be considered in determining the cost of service of carriage. The result of all those statements is that it cost far more to carry live stock than it cost to carry fresh meat and packing-house products. They considered, upon the part of fresh meat and packing-house products, the expense of the cost of the refrigerating car, figured at one cent a mile; the terminal charge, in some cases, two or three dollars a car, and the extra expense in hauling a heavier load, etc.; and upon the part of the live stock, the extra cost of service incurred by carrying men to take care of the cattle on the way to the market, and return transportation for said men; the extra expense of providing stock yards at every shipping place, costing from $800 to $1,200, and $1,400; amount of damages paid by the railroad companies because of delays in reaching the market, and because of the destruction of the property in case of wrecks, etc.

All the above-named witnesses for railroads substantially agreed upon these different items. On the part of the Commission, Edward P. Ripley and his statistician, James Peabody, made comparative statements of the net results from the carriage of these different commodities, upon basis of average cost of all business, per gross ton mile, which is concurred in by the witness Tomlinson, who made further statements, which figures show that it is more expensive to the company to carry fresh meats and packing-house products than live stock; but they did not consider all the burdens peculiar to live stock. All the witnesses agreed in the showing that the cost of service in proportion to the value of both kinds of commodities was greater in carrying live stock.

3. Upon the value of the service to the shipper the testimony of all the witnesses substantially agreed that the value of fresh meats was nearly twice as much as that of live stock, and that of packing-house products a large percentage more than that of live stock. It was also substantially agreed by the witnesses that the risk of carriage, notwithstanding the double value of fresh meats, was not as great in carrying fresh meats and packing-house products as in carrying live stock. This is true on account of the damages for delay to live stock, and additional damages in cases of wrecks. There is not much danger of wrecks in either class of business on account of the good condition of the roadbed and equipment of the railroads.

4. Upon the subject of a proper basis for making rates it was substantially agreed by the witnesses that the following facts were to be considered in fixing a rate:

(a) That it had been the practice for years, and was proper, for railroads to exact all the traffic would stand. By this, meaning not to arbitrarily demand certain rates, but what in the wisdom of the railroad officials they thought they could get from the traffic, taking into consideration the future business of the railway, the prosperity of its patrons, the length of haul, the cheapness and kind of commodity, and other matters of that kind. This is the "value of service" theory. Experts and commissioners have agreed that this is a very important factor, and ought to be the most important unless interfered with by competition. It is like the theory of taxation. This includes the consideration of the value of the goods shipped and the profit shippers can make by the carriage.

(b) The cost of service of the carriage. This has not been an important factor in the opinion of the railroad companies in the past, nor their practice, but in this case all seemed to agree that the cost of service ought to be an important factor in determining the rate. Mr. Stickney was of the opinion that the cost of service arrived at intelligently by a body of experts would be the proper basis upon which to determine fairly to everybody the rate to be adopted, and this could be mathematically figured out all over the country. The other witnesses stated that this cost could not be obtained at all accurately, only approximately.

(c) The weight, bulk, and convenience in handling commodities.

(d) Commercial necessity. It was agreed by all that rates must often be made lower than they would mathematically figure out from cost of service or value to the shipper, because the shipper could not move the commodity unless he got a lower rate than the railroads ought to give him when considering the cost of service.

(e) They all agreed that competition was the greatest factor in determining a rate.

(f) The testimony was all to the effect that, as to commodity traffic and large shipments subject to competition, no skill or science was required in making rates; that rates were forced on carriers by their competitors, regardless of what they ought to be.

5. The testimony showed that the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company, the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company, Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway Company, and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company, of the defendants, extend west from the Missouri River; that the other railroad companies extend to the Missouri River points; that cattle and hogs originating west of the Missouri River, and carried to said river by the first named railroads, come to Chicago and eastern points either upon the balance of the through rates or upon what is called a proportional rate, and that such proportional rate from Missouri River points and St. Paul to Chicago was equal to or less than the rate upon fresh meat and packing-house products. That the local rate from Missouri River points on live stock to Chicago was according to above schedule; that the rate extended for 100 to 150 miles this side of the Missouri River and St. Paul to all points in that zone; that such rates reduced on going to the east until they got to the Mississippi River; and that the average Iowa rate to Chicago was twenty-one cents. The evidence also tended to show that quite a large number of cattle were driven in from points east of the Missouri River and east of St. Paul, to the Missouri River and St. Paul.

6. The undisputed evidence showed that the published rate on fresh meat and packing-house products and live stock from Missouri River points and St. Paul to Chicago were the same up to August, 1902, and that before the railroad injunction referred to in the evidence of March, 1902, the actual rate on live stock was twenty-three and one-half cents from Missouri River points, and on fresh meat and packing-house products rebates were given, making such rates below eighteen cents; that when the said injunction was issued the railroad companies for a time followed the published rate on cattle of twenty-three and one-half cents from Missouri River points and twenty-five cents from St. Paul; that the packing houses at Missouri River points and St. Paul are few in number; that they shipped large quantities of their products at regular intervals; that on account of such large quantities owned by a few shippers they demanded lower rates than the published rate and negotiated with the defendant railroads. The result of the negotiations was that Mr. Stickney, president of the Chicago Great Western Railway Company, in August, 1902, entered into a contract with them for seven years, providing that said railway for that period have a certain proportion of all said packers' business monthly, and it should carry the same for twenty cents per hundred pounds from the Missouri River points, Kansas City, and St. Joseph to Chicago, and eighteen and one-half cents from such points to the Indiana and Illinois line on freight going east of Chicago. That, as stated by Mr. Stickney, the object of his making said contract was to get more of the business, to get what he called his proportion of the business. It appeared that Mr. Stickney's road was the longest route from Missouri River points to Chicago, and that in order to obtain the traffic, or any substantial portion of it, it was necessary for him to make some special arrangements with the packers. Then it became necessary for the other defendant railroads to ship at the same rate in order to get business. It appears from the testimony of all the railroad witnesses on both sides that these rates, according to their judgment, were caused by competition in rates.

7. The effect of the present rates upon the shippers of live stock from intermediate points in Minnesota, Iowa, and Missouri to Chicago and to the Missouri River points and St. Paul was considered. Evidence was taken upon this subject, schedules and tables were put in evidence upon this as well as almost every other rate subject. The substance of that evidence tends to show that a majority of the cattle within 150 miles east from the Missouri River and St. Paul went to Chicago rather than to the Missouri River and southeast from St. Paul upon the present rates; in other words, that the Chicago market is not injured by the present rates.

8. The testimony showed that the Chicago market was the best market; that it controlled the price of all other markets between the Missouri River points and St. Paul; that the Chicago market fluctuated from five cents to fifty or seventy-five cents in a day.

9. The testimony showed that the Santa Fe Railroad Company had cut its live-stock rate to twelve cents for a short period after August, 1902, when the above rates in question went into effect, and that such lowering of the rates of that company did not increase its business to Chicago.

The above is comparatively a very brief statement of the pleadings, the issues arising thereon, and of over 1,000 pages of testimony taken before the Commission and about 3,000 pages of testimony taken before the court in addition thereto, together with a great many tables, statements, and reports prepared by experts.

Bethea, district judge, after making the above statement, announced the following opinion:

The court has considered all of the evidence in the case, and finds the following facts:

FINDINGS OF FACT.

First. That the live-stock rates are reasonable in themselves. All live stock from points west, southwest, and northwest of the Missouri River and St. Paul are shipped on a proportional rate from the Missouri River or St. Paul to Chicago. These rates are equal to or less than the rates on dressed meats and packing-house products between the same points. There can be and is no complaint as to such traffic. The local rates from the Missouri River and St. Paul and from 150 miles east to Chicago are as shown in above schedule. These rates gradually decrease until the Mississippi River is reached, and the average Iowa rate is twenty-one cents. The great weight of evidence indicates that these rates are at least reasonably low.

Second. That the cost of carrying live stock is greater than that of carrying dressed meats and packing-house products.

Third. That the value of the service of carriage is greater to the packers because of the higher price of a car of dressed meats or packing-house products. Dressed meats and packing-house products are in value worth nearly twice as much as live stock. This factor is important, in ordinary cases, however, in part, because of the greater risk of carriage of high-priced commodities. In these cases as to the particular commodities in question, the evidence shows that the defendant railroad companies pay out a much larger amount in damages for losses arising from the carriage of live stock than they do for losses arising from the carriage of dressed meats and packing-house products, in proportion to the value of the products carried, and more in damages per car regardless of the value. This makes the risk of carriage greater for live stock. The result is that the value of the service is not such an important factor in this kind of a case as it is considered to be in ordinary cases.

Fourth. That the rates in question given to the packers at Missouri River and St. Paul were the result of competition. The product of the packers at these points was large in quantity, was certain and continuous in amount, was in the hands of a few people, and for years before the Federal injunction of March, 1902, had been competed for so strenuously by the railroads reaching and passing through these points as to cause the cutting of rates and the giving of secret rebates in large amounts. Four of the defendant companies, the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company, the Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company, the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company, and the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company, passed through these points into the territory west of the Missouri River and St. Paul. Four other of the defendant companies, the Chicago, Great Western Railway Company, the Chicago & Alton Railway Company, the Illinois Central Railroad Company, and the Wabash Railroad Company, reached the Missouri River points and St. Paul, competing for this business. Other railroads running south to the Gulf of Mexico also competed more or less for said business, including the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway.

After said injunction was granted the defendant railroads obeyed it, and until August of that year the said traffic was carried under competition between the defendant at the rate of twenty-three and one-half cents from Missouri River points to Chicago, and twenty-five cents from St. Paul to Chicago, etc., as set out above. As a result of such competition, the Chicago Great Western Railway Company became dissatisfied with the proportion of the business it received, and in order to get what it claimed as its share, cut the rate to twenty cents to Chicago and eighteen and one-half cents to the Indiana line for eastern business, and published the same. This it did under a contract with the packers running for seven years. The Chicago Great Western Railway Company was the longest route from Chicago to the Missouri River points. The other railroad defendants, to meet the rate made by the Chicago Great Western Railway Company, as a result of competition, met and published the same rate. These rates were not made voluntarily, but from necessity arising from competition. The necessity being that of carrying the goods at the lower rate or losing the business to which the officers of said companies thought they were entitled. This cutting of the rate by the Chicago Great Western Railway Company was not the origin of competition; that had existed legally since March, 1902, between defendant railroads and also between them and the Atchison, Topeka & Sante Fe Railway Company.

There was not competition enough at said points to lower the rate as to live stock. There was little and different competition on rates as to live stock at points between the Missouri River and St. Paul and Chicago. The only places where the opportunities for competition existed as to live stock the same as to packing-house products were immediately at Missouri River points and St. Paul, and there only as to live stock driven in on foot from the surrounding country. There is comparatively a small amount of this stock. If it was exactly the same kind of a commodity as that furnished by the packers there would be an opportunity for competition in this at these points alone.

Fifth. That the competition in question did not result from agreement of the defendants, but was actual genuine competition.

Sixth. That the present rates have not materially affected any of the markets, prices, or shipments; that they are reasonably fair to Chicago and to the shippers; that the shipments of live stock from points between Chicago and the Missouri River and St. Paul are as great in proportion to the volume of business as before the present rates were made; that the majority of the live stock comes to Chicago from points as near as 150 miles this side of the Missouri River and St. Paul, and that the lower rate given to the packers does not seem to directly influence or injure the shippers of live stock.

Seventh. That the rates for carrying packers' products and dressed meats were remunerative. They did not pay any portion of the fixed charges and interest of the railroad companies, nor its full share of the operating expenses, but they did pay more than its cost of movement and leave something to apply upon operating expenses.

Eighth. That the welfare of the public, including the shippers, consumers, and all localities and markets, does not seem to be materially affected by the present rates.

Ninth. That the usual custom is for railroads to charge a higher rate for the finished product than for the raw material, and this, as a rule, has been applied to live stock and its finished products. This is not universal, however. There are many commodities where the raw material is charged more for carriage than its finished product, as in the case of the raw material of cotton and the compressed cotton, straw, unbaled and baled, pig iron and its products, and many other commodities.

It also appears that for sixteen years out of twenty-three, between Missouri River points and St. Paul and Chicago, the published rates on live stock were higher than on dressed meats and packing-house products. Many witnesses testified that the ideal rate for the finished product would be higher than the raw material. This, however, was based on the presumption that competition or commercial necessity did not interfere, and that the cost of service and value of the products would be greater in case of the finished products than in that of the raw material.

THE LAW.

What is the law applicable to the above facts? These petitions were filed to enforce sections 1 and 3 of the interstate-commerce act and section 3 of the Elkins Act. They are as follows:

Sec. 1. "All charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property as aforesaid, or in connection therewith, or for the receiving, delivering, storage, or handling of such property, shall be reasonable and just; and every unjust and unreasonable charge for such service is prohibited and declared to be unlawful."

Sec. 3. "That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever."

Elkins Act, Sec. 3. "That whenever the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have reasonable ground for belief that any common carrier is engaged in the carriage of passengers or freight traffic between given points at less that the published rates on file, or is committing any discriminations forbidden by law, a petition may be presented alleging such facts to the circuit court of the United States sitting in equity having jurisdiction," etc.

The questions are: Do the facts in these cases show that the defendants have under section 1 of the interstate-commerce act furnished reasonable rates? Have they, under section 3 thereof, given any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic in any respect whatever? Have they, under section 3 of the Elkins Act, committed any discriminations forbidden by law? Or, in other words, did it make an undue preference in favor of the packers, or their products, at the Missouri River points and St. Paul or unjustly discriminate against live stock, the shippers thereof, or against Chicago, for the defendants to lower the rates for the packers without making the same or a greater reduction for the shippers of live stock?

I. The evidence above shows that section 1 has not been violated; the rates were not unreasonable.

II. Section 3 of the Elkins Act covers the same questions as do sections 1 and 3 of the original interstate-commerce act. That section provides a remedy without going before the Interstate Commerce Commission for the commission of any discriminations forbidden by law. Those forbidden by law, so far as the questions involved in these cases are concerned, are the prohibitions in sections 1 and 3 of the interstate-commerce act. Section 1 is disposed of. Section 3 will hereafter be discussed.

III. Does the evidence show a violation of section 3 of the interstate-commerce act?

A. The principal objects of the interstate-commerce act, as shown by the many cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, were to secure just and reasonable charges for transportation; to prohibit unjust discriminations in the rendition of like service under similar circumstances and conditions; to prevent undue or unreasonable preference to persons, corporations, or localities; to inhibit greater compensation for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, and to abolish combinations for the pooling of freight. It was not designed to prevent competition between different roads, but rather to encourage competition. The railroad companies under the decisions of the courts in England and the United States are only bound under this act to give the same terms to all persons alike under the same conditions and circumstances, and any fact which produces an inequality of condition and a change of circumstances justifies an inequality of charge. Interstate Commerce Commission v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, 145 U. S., 272.

The object of section 3 was to prevent undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic. The statute does not define undue or unreasonable preference or advantage. That must be left to the circumstances of each case. It is proper, under this section, to give a preference or an advantage, or to discriminate between persons, localities, or traffic; but not make them undue or unreasonable. (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Alabama Midland Railway Company, 168 U. S., 144; Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railway Company v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 162 U. S., 184.)

B. What is meant, then, by "undue" or "unreasonable" preference or advantage

Judge Jackson, in the case of Interstate Commerce Commission v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company (43 Fed. Rep., 37), stated that "These words necessarily involve the idea or element of comparison of one service or traffic with another similarly situated and circumstanced, and require that to be undue and unreasonable the preference or prejudice must relate and have reference to competing parties, producing between them unfairness and an unjust inequality in the rates charged them respectively for contemporaneous service under substantially the same circumstances and conditions. In determining the question whether rates give an undue preference or impose an undue prejudice or disadvantage, consideration must be had to the relation which the persons or traffic affected bear to each other and to the carrier. When and so long as their relations are similar or 'substantially' so, the carrier is prohibited from dealing differently with them in the matter of charges for a like and contemporaneous service." * * *

"The English cases referred to above, and others that might be cited, establish the rule that in passing upon the question of undue or unreasonable preference or advantage it is not only legitimate, but proper, to take into consideration, besides the mere differences in charges, various elements, such as the convenience of the public, the fair interest of the carrier, the relative quantities or volume of the traffic involved, the relative cost of the services and profit to the company, and the situation and circumstances of the respective customers with reference to each other, as competitive or otherwise."

This opinion was affirmed in 145 U. S., 263, and followed in other opinions of the Supreme Court.

(a) A careful examination of the opinions of that court, as well as the evidence taken in these cases, shows that there are a great many factors and circumstances to be considered in fixing a rate. Among other things:

1. The value of the service to the shipper, including the value of the goods and the profit he could make out of them by shipment. This is considered an ideal method. It includes the theory so strenuously contended for by petitioners, the Commission and its attorneys, of making the finished product carry a higher rate than the raw material. This method is considered practical, and is based on an idea similar to taxation. Interstate Commerce Commission v. B. & O. Ry. Co., 43 Fed Rep. 37, 53. 2. The cost of service to the carrier would be an ideal theory, but is not practical. Such cost can be reached approximately but not accurately enough to make this factor controlling. It is worthy of consideration, however. Interstate Commerce Commission v. B. & O. Ry. Co., supra; Ransome v. Eastern Railway Company (1857), 1 C. B., 437; 26 L. J. C. P., 91; Judson on Interstate Commerce, sections 148, 149; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Call Publishing Co., 181 U. S., 92; Detroit, Grand Haven & Milwaukee Railroad Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 167 U. S., 633. 3. Weight, bulk, and convenience of transportation. 4. The amount of the product or the commodity in the hands of a few persons to ship or compete for, recognizing the principle of selling cheaper at wholesale than at retail. Interstate Commerce Commission v. B. & O. Ry. Co., 145 U. S., 263. 5. General public good, including good to the shipper, the railroad company, and the different localities. Interstate Commerce Commission v. B. & O. Ry. Co., 145 U. S., 263. 6. Competition, which the authorities, as well as the experts, in their testimony in these cases, recognize as a very important factor. Pickering Phipps v. London & Northwestern Railway Company, 2 Q. B. D. (1892), 229. (This case construes section 2 of the English act of 1854, which is almost like section 3 of our interstate-commerce act.) Interstate Commerce Commission v. B. & O. Ry. Co., supra; Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railway Company v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 162 U. S., 184; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Alabama Midland Railway Company, 168 U. S., 144; Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Behlmer, 175 U. S., 648; East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 181 U. S., 1; Texas & Pacific Railway Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 162 U. S., 197; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Louisville and Nashville Railroad Co., 190 U. S., 273. The Supreme Court has also held that it may be presumed that Congress, in adopting the language of the English act, had in mind the constructions given to the words "undue preference" by the courts of England. Interstate Commerce Commission v. B. & O. Ry. Co., 145 U. S., 284.

None of the above factors alone are considered necessarily controlling by the authorities. Neither are they all controlling as a matter of law. It is a question of fact to be decided by the proper tribunal in each case as to what is controlling. In every case the Supreme Court has held that competition may be controlling. In only one case has it, as a matter of fact, been held not to be a defense.

C. Counsel for the Commission strenuously contend in able arguments that competition does not apply to section 3 of the interstate commerce act. The authorities, however, are to the contrary. The question was raised in substantially all of the above and others of the Supreme Court cases wherever section 4 was considered. In the following cases the Supreme Court has held that this principle of competition applies to section 3: East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Ry. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 181 U. S., 1, and cases cited; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Alabama Midland Railway Company, 168 U. S., 144, and cases cited from English court; Judson on Interstate Commerce, sections 175 to 183; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Atlantic Ry. Co. et al., 93 Fed. Rep., 83.

D. But it is further claimed by petitioners' counsel that competition should not have any effect in settling the questions involved in these cases, because one of the defendants originated the competition. The Interstate Commerce Commission, in its opinion, considered the facts as to competition and found they did not control the fixing of rates. Its opinion, and the concurring opinion of Commissioner Knapp, show, however, that the majority of the Commission acting in this case (Fifer and Prouty) thought that it was not a case to which competition applied. Their position is that competition can not apply to this case because one of the defendants (the Chicago Great Western Railway Company) originated the competition in rates. They argue that in all of the other cases decided by the Supreme Court the competition resulting in the cutting of rates was begun by some transportation company not a defendant in the hearing before the Commission and the court, and that the identical question involved in this case has not been passed upon by the Supreme Court. They further argue that in those cases the question as to the construction of the words "particular description of traffic" was not raised or disposed of. In reply it may be said that the questions of undue preference against persons or localities were in the decided cases, and those questions are in these. Besides, an undue preference can not be given to a "particular description of traffic" without giving it to a "person" also. The same principle must apply to the traffic, the same construction must be given to all of the sentence that is given to a part of it. One sentence in section 3 applies to persons, localities, and particular descriptions of traffic. The same words "undue preference" apply to all those conditions, and the words "undue preference" must mean the same when applied to one condition as to another. It may be that the cases passed upon by the Supreme Court were cases where the railroad company starting the lowering of the rate was not a defendant. But the courts have held that where the rate is first lowered by competitors subject to the interstate-commerce law the competition must be considered. (East Tennessee, V. & G. Ry. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 181 U. S., 1; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Southern Railway Company, 105 Fed. Rep., 703.) If counsel's contention was correct, the right of the railroad companies to set up competition as a defense could be removed by making the company starting the reduction of rates a party defendant. This construction would also discourage competition, which the act, as well as the antitrust act, was intended to encourage. (East Tennessee, V. & G. Ry. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 191 U. S., 1; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Southern Railway Company, 105 Fed. Rep., 703.) Why a defendant cannot begin the competition is not apparent. Some one must begin. Why not a defendant, if he is losing the business?

The facts in these cases show that competition was going on between these different defendants and other railroad companies that were not defendants (particularly the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company), before the granting of the injunction in March, 1902, and that such competition was going on under the law after March, 1902, down to August 8, 1902, when the Chicago Great Western Railway Company's contract was made and the above rates fixed. Each company was striving to get what business it could. The Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company, which is not a defendant here, was a very formidable competitor and had perhaps the shortest route between the points in question. The other railroad companies, who had longer routes, as did the Chicago Great Western Railway Company, in order to get business, were forced to do something to accommodate and please its patrons. That was going on during all the time mentioned, and was competition. So it can not be said that competition was originated by the Chicago Great Western Railway Company. That company lowered the rates, and competition forced the other defendants, including the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company, to lower their rates. It is the duty of the officers of a railroad company to get business in the interest of its stockholders.

It appears then, under the facts, that the reduction of rates was not voluntary, according to the definition and description thereof in the case of East Tennessee, V. & G. Ry. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, supra, and other cases, but was caused on the part of the Chicago Great Western Railway Company by the necessity of competing for business which under the law they were required to do.

E. The evidence shows that the rates were (1) remunerative, (2) reasonable, (3) that competition was not the result of agreement, and (4) that the carrier must reduce the rate or lose the business.

There was then a meeting here of all the four conditions required by the law to make competition a factor in the fixing of these rates. This is set out by Mr. Judson in his work on interstate commerce in a discussion of section 3 and effect of competition on it in the following language:

"But under the decisions of the Supreme Court the application of the competitive rule is subject to the following qualifications: First, the competition must compel the lower rate—that is, the competition must be controlling; the carrier must either reduce its rates or lose the business; second, the competition must not be created by the carrier—that is, the preference must not be affected through an agreement or combination of the carrier with other carriers stifling competition; third, the competitive rate must be at the preferred point remunerative to the carrier; fourth, the rates must be reasonable in themselves."

That author shows in section 183 how materially competition has affected the enforcement of section 3 of the interstate-commerce act.

It must be remembered in reference to this question of competition that there are more railroads competing for the packers' products than for the live stock, as shown in the findings of fact, supra. There are four railroads west of the Missouri River carrying live stock east to Chicago, besides the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company. There are eight of the defendant railroads competing for the packers' products at the Missouri River to carry it east to Chicago. There are other railroads running south from the Missouri River that may make more or less competition. As to the live stock east of the river, there is much less and an entirely different kind of competition from that arising at the Missouri River points and St. Paul for the packers' business. Upon the principles announced in the above authorities, if the different commodities were exactly the same, as if it were all live stock or all packers' products, the railroads would have a right to consider, east of the Missouri River and St. Paul, the stronger competition at Missouri River points and St. Paul in fixing their rate the same as they do under section 4, or the long-and-short-haul clause.

So we are limited to the live stock driven into the Missouri River points and St. Paul, in determining whether that commodity is there entitled to the same rate as packers' products shipped from those same points.

F. The contention is that because the defendant companies have reduced the rate there as to packers' commodities they must reduce it at the same identical points as to live stock. But there is strong competition at all those points as to packers' products—competition in rates—and there is no such competition at the same points as to live stock. It is argued that because they compete as to one kind of a commodity they must compete as to other kinds of commodities at the same points.

This is substantially the same question that was raised in the case of Interstate Commerce Commission v. Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company (Lagrange), 190 U. S., 273. In that case the Interstate Commerce Commission held that because the defendant companies competed at one point they must compete at another, but the Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Justice White, said: "In the report of the Commission a suggestion is found that Lagrange should be entitled to the same rate as Atlanta, because if the carriers concerned in this case in connection with other carriers reaching Lagrange choose to do so, they might bring about competition by the way of a line between Macon and Lagrange, which would be equivalent to the competitive conditions existing at Atlanta. We are unable, however, to follow the suggestion. To adopt it would amount to this: That the substantial dissimilarity of circumstances and conditions provided by the act to regulate commerce would depend, not as has been repeatedly held, upon a real and substantial competition at a particular point affecting rates, but upon the mere possibility of the arising of such competition. This would destroy the whole effect of the act and cause every case where competition was involved to depend, not upon the fact of its existence as affecting rates, but upon the possibility of its arising.

The same principle must apply here. The construction is of the same sentence. In that case it was a portion of the sentence that referred to localities or certain shippers, or a certain kind of a particular description of traffic, if you please. In these cases it refers to a "description of traffic" and "to shippers."

G. In passing upon this question of competition it is the duty of the Commissioners and the court to take into consideration, in determining whether the circumstances and conditions are the same, and whether prejudice is undue or not, the quantity of the traffic in each case. While this may not be controlling, still it ought to be considered. In the Party Rate case, supra (145 U. S., 272), it was held controlling as to passengers. In the English cases above cited it has been held a very important factor as to freight. The facts show there is a large amount of packers' products to be shipped at stated intervals, fixed and continuous quantities, in the hands of a few people, under almost one control. The live stock is not in such hands, and can not and does not create such competition.

After considering as far as possible all the surrounding circumstances and conditions, and considering the rates between the two classes of products involved in these suits and the law as announced by the Supreme Court, this court holds that lawful competition must be considered as a factor in determining the questions of fact as to undue preference and unjust discrimination.

APPLICATION OF THE LAW.

The court is bound to consider all of the above facts and factors with others in determining whether the preference and advantage in question is "undue" or "unjust." In such consideration there appears in favor of the preference and advantage given to the packing-house products the cost of service, the damage to the commodities, the quantity of the commodity in the hands of a few persons, the less bulk, the interest of the railroad companies, the interest of a majority of the localities and consumers, the general dissimilarity of conditions, and competition; while there is in favor of the live stock the less value of the product and of the service in the carriage, the interests of Chicago and its markets, the stock yards, and dealers in live stock there. The evidence shows that in substantially all cases the factor of competition alone controls the rate. The Supreme Court in all cases has held that competition may be controlling. In only one case (Social Circle) has competition as a matter of fact been held not to make a defense to the charge of discrimination or undue preference. When all the factors are considered together the conclusion must be reached that the preference and advantage in question is not "undue" or "unjust," and sections 3 of the interstate-commerce act has not been violated; nor has section 1 of that act nor section 3 of the Elkins Act. Upon a consideration of all the evidence the court holds that the prima facie case made by the findings of the Commission has been overcome by the evidence offered before the court. The order of the Commission in the first case is not lawful and should not be enforced, and the prayer of the petition in the second case should be denied. The petitions of the Interstate Commerce Commission are dismissed with costs.

Mr. FORAKER. I have just given the name of the gentleman who sent me the analysis of the decision.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The paper will also be printed in the RECORD, as the Senator requests, if there is no objection.

The paper referred to is as follows:

An analysis of the above decision, stating in part what it shows, by Blackburn Esterline, esq., a member of the bar of the city of Chicago.

(In the circuit court of the United States, northern district of Illinois, eastern division.)

(No. 27723.—Interstate Commerce Commission v. Numerous railway companies.)

(No. 27829.—Interstate Commerce Commission v. Numerous railway companies.)

The above cases, in which about twenty railway companies were represented, were decided by Hon. S. H. Bethea, sitting in the circuit court of the United States, on Monday, November 20, 1905, and the bills filed by the Interstate Commerce Commission were dismissed.

The defendants are carriers from the Missouri River and St. Paul to Chicago. Prior to August 8, 1902, the published rates of the companies for carrying fresh meats and packing-house products from the points named to Chicago were the same as the published rates for carrying live stock from the same points to Chicago. On that date the Chicago Great Western Railway Company, which had the longest route, in order to secure business entered into a contract in good faith with the Missouri River packers, in which it cut the rate on fresh meats 3 cents per hundred pounds. This inaugurated a stiff competition on the part of all the roads for the fresh meat and packing-house products, on which the rates were severely cut, though the rates on live stock remained unchanged. The Interstate Commerce Commission held that this was in violation of the interstate-commerce act and that it constituted a wrongful prejudice and discrimination; the carriers were accordingly ordered to lower the rates on live stock also, and to cease and desist, etc., on or before February 15, 1905, wherein they failed, and the Commission commenced the suits.

By counsel for the Commission it was contended that the rates were unreasonable under section 1, and that the defendants were committing an unlawful discrimination against the locality of Chicago and against live cattle and live hogs and the shippers thereof, and that they were giving an undue and unreasonable preference or advantage to the traffic in fresh meats and packing-house products, in violation of section 3 of the interstate-commerce act and the Elkins Act. The railway companies denied the charges, contending that there was no relative similarity between the products and the live stock; that when the cost of service was considered they could carry the products cheaper than the live stock; that the risk of carriage of the former was lower, and that the difference in rates was the result of competition.

The hearing lasted a month and 4,000 pages of testimony were taken and considered, together with many tables, etc. The case generally and the opinion of the court hinged largely on the question of competition, which became the controlling factor. It was said by counsel for the Commission that competition was not a factor to be considered in determining the question of fact as to undue preference and unjust discrimination, but the court held that it was. In other words, it held that the question of undue preference and unjust discrimination against one place over another is secondary to the question of competition of railway companies when the competition is not the result of agreement, but is carried on in good faith in order to get business and the rates reasonable and remunerative to the company.

Judge Bethea, in his opinion, declared that he had given as full consideration to all the facts and circumstances in the case as it was possible for him to give; and, after such full consideration, he held that the prima facie case as made by the findings of the Commission had been overthrown by the evidence taken before him.

The very important feature about it all is this: That if the Interstate Commerce Commission had had the power, on February 15, 1905, to enforce the order it entered on that date to lower the rates on live stock also, the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company, as shown by the sworn testimony, based on the business of the past year, would have sustained an actual and direct loss, during the time which elapsed before the court set aside the erroneous order, of $300,000; the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railway Company a like sum, and the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company a like sum, and all the other defendants an actual and direct loss equal to that sustained by the three companies named, making a total of $1,800,000. It also appeared that the indirect losses of all the companies would have doubled the latter sum.

Mr. FORAKER. Now, in addition to what is thus made to appear, I wish to call attention to the fact that it appears from this opinion of the court and from the record that complaint in this case was filed before the Interstate Commerce Commission March 31, 1902; that the hearing upon that complaint was not commenced before the Commission until January 22, 1903, and that the Commission's decision on that complaint, finding that there was discrimination and ordering a discontinuance of it, was not rendered until January 7, 1905. When rendered it was ordered that it go into effect February 15, 1905. The order was disregarded by the railroads, and subsequently, upon the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, suit was brought against them to enforce the order of the Commission on the 29th of April, 1905. The Commission afterwards brought an additional suit under the Elkins Act, July 17, 1905. The court thus being appealed to took up the cases, as it was required to do under the law providing for a summary proceeding in such a case, heard many witnesses, the testimony in the aggregate amounting to something like 4,000 pages, and rendered a final judgment November 20, 1905.

I introduce all this simply to show, if I may be allowed to add a word, the state of the law with respect to remedies against certain of the evils that are complained of, and showing also, not only that there is a remedy in court ample for most of the evils that are complained of, but the expedition with which that remedy can be arrived at in the court. Instead of a proceeding pending for two or three years, as this did before the Commission, by the reference of it to the court as provided in at least one of the bills that have been introduced, that the court shall proceed summarily and hear it, the court proceeded and considered the whole case, and all the cases, and rendered final judgment which, when you come to look at the opinion of the court, you will see, covered every aspect of the case and accomplished it all in something like five or six months from the time when the suit was commenced in the court.

Mr. CULLOM. In brief, what was the decision of the court?

Mr. FORAKER. I did not expect to speak of that, for I did not want to comment on it at any length and take the time of the Senate now; but the court reversed the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, finding that it was erroneously made, and that there was no such discrimination as the Commission had found.

In the analysis of the case which I have filed, made by Mr. Esterline, it is shown that if the order had gone into effect at the time when it was made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, or at the date fixed by the Commission, February 15, 1905, for it to take effect, it would have cost the railroads in loss of revenue, and wrongful loss, according to this decision, almost $2,000,000 by actual computation based on sworn testimony.

I put this in the RECORD to show the character of legislation that is being proposed, and in order to show the remedies we now have, in order that before we provide others we may know what we have.

I ask that the decision of Judge Bethea and the accompanying statements may be also printed as a document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that one of the papers introduced by the Senator from Ohio—at least offered by him for publication in the RECORD—constitutes the instructions issued by the Attorney-General quite recently to the district attorneys of the United States throughout the country. I understood the Senator to say, in some remarks which he submitted a week or so ago in the Senate, that there was no longer any complaint respecting rebates by railroads.

Now, I will ask him this question: Pursuant to those instructions of the Attorney-General did not a grand jury at Philadelphia and at Chicago last week return a number of bills of indictment against officials of railway companies for granting rebates, and if the Senator has that information will he not also insert it in the RECORD to go along with his statement?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I have no objection to the Senator inserting in the RECORD anything he may desire to have inserted in the RECORD.

With respect to the statement I made about rebates, the Senator has not accurately quoted me. Inadvertently, of course, the inaccuracy crept into his statement.

What I said about rebates, as I now recall my language, was that it was generally conceded that since the passage of the Elkins law rebates had been practically discontinued, and if not discontinued the law was ample, if properly enforced, to compel the discontinuance of rebates.

The States have very good laws against arson, against burglary, against murder. The legislatures of the States have done all they can reasonably do to prevent those crimes; but notwithstanding the law they will be and are committed.

I did not say there were no rebates. I did not say there were no excessive rates. I said there was provision by law against rebates and against excessive rates and against discrimination, and that so far as rebates are concerned, if not discontinued, all the Attorney-General had to do was to enforce the law and he would come as near breaking up the practice as you can come by enforcing any law to break up any criminal practice.

If some Senator will point out to me what I said on that subject I will read it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly. I was just looking to find what I said.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I do not remember, of course, exactly what I said a moment ago, but I think I said the Senator stated in a former speech in the Senate that there were no complaints at this time against the system of rebates. What I desired was to call his attention to the question as to whether he was not mistaken in that statement. Of course it is a mere expression of opinion to a degree, but that there were complaints is shown by the instructions of the Attorney-General of the United States quite recently, and that acting upon those instructions it had been discovered by the grand juries at Philadelphia and at Chicago that rebates had been granted by railroad companies within very recent times.

I was simply calling attention to it to show, if I could, that the Senator was mistaken in the opinion he expressed, that there were now no complaints against the system of rebating since the passage of the Elkins law.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, I will now quote from the speech I made a few days ago in the Senate to which he referred, so that I may in that way put before the Senate exactly what I did say:

So far as rebates are concerned, we legislated on that subject three years ago now almost—in February, 1903—when we passed the so-called "Elkins law." In that measure we provided a remedy against rebates. Up to that time the giving of rebates was justly regarded as the worst abuse practiced by the railroads of this country upon the shippers of this country. I had the honor to be a member of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce then, as I have now. I had something to do with the putting of that act in the form in which it was finally passed and in which it became a law. We undertook then to deal with rebates and with discriminations. What is the result? According to the testimony of every man who has spoken on this subject before our committee—every man on both sides of this controversy, I think without exception, since that law was enacted and put into force—rebates have practically been discontinued; and, if not discontinued, all unite in saying that the statute thus put upon the statute books by the Congress of the United States is all the legislation that it is necessary to enact in order to provide a legislative remedy full, ample, and complete against that kind of abuse.

So the Senator will see I did not say there were no rebates being granted now. I have no doubt there are some violations of this law, as there are violations of every law on the statute books. These railroads extend all over this country; the rates number into the millions; shippers are every day sending their products over these roads not only by thousands but by hundreds of thousands. It would be quite singular if there were not some violations.

What I was calling attention to is the fact which stands uncontradicted—no man can successfully contradict it—that the Congress has undertaken to provide a complete remedy against that abuse, and I think it will be found to be a sufficient remedy if the Attorney-General will only continue, as he has now started in to do, to enforce the law vigorously, rigidly, as the Congress expected him to do when it was enacted.

But however that may be, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] well suggests, the mere fixing of a rate, a maximum rate or a minimum rate or any other kind of a rate, will not afford any remedy for the granting of rebates.

But I did not want to engage in any discussion at this time of this subject. I wanted to put in the RECORD, where it will be available to all who may desire to read it, that which I think is very pertinent to be considered at this time as showing the state of the law with respect to this whole subject.

I take it the Congress does not want to legislate unless there is some necessity for it. My opinion is, as I have said over and over again, that the legislation which is needed is not something that is revolutionary in its character, but a mere amending and strengthening of the law that is now on the statute book. In that way every abuse that is complained of can be reached and can be successfully dealt with, in my opinion.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the purpose I had in view, and the only purpose, was to draw attention to the fact that railroad companies quite recently have granted rebates and have been indicted for that offense.

The speech of the Senator from Ohio a week or so ago had a distinct purpose in view. He was arguing against any legislation on this subject. He was stating reasons which, in his opinion, rendered any further legislation upon the rate question useless and unnecessary. Among other propositions he made was the proposition with reference to rebates that no other legislation was necessary for two reasons. One was that rebates had practically ceased, and the other was that we have a sufficient law upon the subject already. All the purpose I had in the inquiry I made of the Senator from Ohio, Mr. President, was to show that in his statement that rebates had practically ceased by reason of the Elkins law he was simply mistaken.

It is true the Senator from Ohio has introduced a bill in the Senate providing, in effect, as I construe the bill, that the courts of the United States may fix rates that shall be operative in the future, because that proposed law, as I construe it, provides that the courts shall discriminate between what part of the rate is unreasonable and what part is reasonable, and shall restrain the operation of the unreasonable part, leaving the remainder of the rate in force, which, as I understand the English language, means that these courts shall, in effect, establish a rate which shall operate in the future.

Mr. President, I said a moment ago that, as I understood the object of the Senator from Ohio a week or two ago, he was opposed to any legislation upon this subject. That statement apparently was rather broad and probably too broad, because the Senator himself, as I knew at the time and I ought to have stated at the time, has introduced a bill upon the subject.

What I intended to state, Mr. President, was that the Senator was opposing any additional legislation upon the subject of rebates upon two grounds, I reiterate, the first of which was that rebates had practically ceased and that the legislation existing upon the subject at this time was sufficient. I did not intend to provoke any debate upon this subject, but I wanted the statement to go along with his statement in the RECORD with reference to the instructions of the Attorney-General, that those instructions had brought forth fruit and had secured the indictment of a number of railway officials, as I understand it, at Philadelphia and Chicago for this illegal conduct.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the Senator entirely misunderstood me if he got the idea from anything I said when I spoke here a week or ten days ago, or from anything I have said at any time, that I did not think it necessary to have any additional legislation. On the contrary, I have all the while advocated additional legislation. The only difference between the Senator and myself, and the only difference between other Senators and myself, is as to the particular remedy which we shall undertake by law to provide to correct the abuses that are being practiced.

The remarks I made the other day were upon the bill introduced by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I was complimenting him upon the simplicity of his measure and upon the fact that it did not undertake to deal with a lot of subjects that had already been satisfactorily dealt with, in my opinion; and I did call attention to the fact that, so far as rebates were concerned, it is the commonly expressed opinion that since the Elkins law was enacted rebates have been practically discontinued. And why discontinued? Because the railroads and the shippers alike knew that there was a law since that time on the statute book which by its mere enforcement would bring punishment upon them if they granted or accepted rebates. I did not pretend to say that there have been no rebates granted since the enactment of the Elkins law; I did not pretend to say that the railroads were not giving rebates to-day. On the contrary, I said that, if not practically discontinued, as had been suggested by witnesses and as we had been told by everybody who has discussed this subject, there was a law, and it was ample, if properly enforced, to break up and discontinue the practice. That is all there was of that.

I do not want to drift into a general discussion of this subject this morning, but the Senator made some remarks about the lack or want of power in the courts to enjoin what is an unreasonable or an excessive rate that is being charged. That is a pretty broad subject.

I read an interview, or what purported to be an interview, with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] in regard to my bill shortly after it was presented to the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, in which he disposed of that subject with a great deal more facility and confidence than I was able to dispose of it when I commenced to investigate it.

I have been surprised, Mr. President, to see how many constitutional lawyers there are editing newspapers and writing articles for the newspapers. Every day almost I see some great constitutional question disposed of by some man who does not pretend to be a lawyer, but only a newspaper or magazine writer.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the Senator permit me a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Presently. I want to say a few words in answer to the Senator before I quit, and then I shall yield to any question.

What my bill provides, Mr. President, is not that the courts shall make a rate. I took particular pains when speaking here a week or ten days ago to say that the court—I agree with the Senator in that—has no power to make rates; the court can exercise only judicial power; and the making of rates for the future is a legislative act; but it is a judicial function to make inquiry to ascertain whether or not a railroad is charging an unlawful rate, and if it be charging an unlawful rate it is a judicial power to restrain the collection of anything in excess of that which is lawful. It does not make any difference that the court has to hear witnesses and inquire and ascertain what is lawful instead of turning to the statute and reading the figures written down there to express what the lawful rate shall be. The court, in the case the Senator suggests, would simply ascertain, upon complaint being made, what is the lawful rate fixed by the statute. There is a lawful rate fixed for every railroad in this country by a statute now in force, and a statute that has been in force ever since the interstate-commerce act was enacted in 1887, just as there was before, according to the rule of the common law, which is now a statutory provision, however, declaratory of the rule of the common law, that no railroad shall be allowed to charge in excess of what is reasonable and just, and anything in excess of what is reasonable and just shall be deemed unreasonable and unlawful. That fixes a lawful rate. The courts have held, whenever they have had occasion, that that provision fixed a lawful rate. When somebody complains to a court of equity and says, "I am a shipper; I am shipping every day; I am charged excessive rates, and I should not be required to go into court to sue in an action at law to recover damages; to avoid a multiplicity of suits I come into a court of equity. If I am charged a rate in excess of the lawful rate prescribed by statute, the court has a right, and I ask it, to inquire what is a lawful rate." If it had been written down in some statute the court could turn to and read—I mean if it had been written down in so many figures there would be no trouble—the case would be easy and clear—but having been written down simply by the prescription of a standard, the court must make inquiry. That does not change the nature of the case; that has been a judicial function ever since the common law was administered. A similar question has arisen from almost every exercise of the police power to make inquiry into and determine what is reasonable; and when it determines what is reasonable as to a rate it determines what is the lawful rate.

Applying that proposition to rates, therefore, when the court restrains all in excess of the lawful rate, the court does not make a rate; the rate is already made by the statute; and the court simply gives effect to the rate which the statute has prescribed as the lawful rate.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I do not know how much of the Senator's remarks are intended to apply to me in what he said with reference to constitutional lawyers and constitutional writers, but——

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator will certainly allow me to say that I would not, even in the most indirect way, reflect upon the Senator, or criticise him as a lawyer or as a gentleman. We all acknowledge his very distinguished ability.

Mr. CULBERSON. I was simply going to say, Mr. President, that, so far as the constitutional question is concerned, I am perfectly willing that its determination, so far as the Senate is concerned, shall await a full discussion on this floor.

Passing from the constitutional question, Mr. President, and going back to the point which I had in view at the outset—that is to say, whether or not there are any rebates being granted now, and whether the law on the subject of rebates is sufficient, I want to call the attention of the Senator—not that it is necessary to do so, but in order to get this provision in the RECORD—to this clause in the Elkins law:

> In all convictions occurring after the passage of this act for offenses under said acts to regulate commerce, whether committed before or after the passage of this act, or for offenses under this section, no penalty shall be imposed on the convicted party other than the fine prescribed by law, imprisonment wherever now prescribed as part of the penalty being hereby abolished.

Now, I will ask the Senator, in the first place, if he believes that the original law ought to have been modified to that extent; and, second, whether or not it is his opinion that a repeal of this part of the Elkins law and the reinstatement of the original law for punishment by imprisonment would not add to the efficacy of the law against rebates?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I should have no objection to that amendment being made, if the Senator from Texas and other Senators, after consideration, think it is a proper amendment. I think the imprisonment clause was dropped out because the law was made to apply by the Elkins Act to corporations, and it would be rather difficult to put a corporation in the penitentiary. So it was thought by some who were on the committee, in their simple-minded view of the matter, that punishment should be the same to all for the same offense. That is all there was of that, except it was also thought that the imprisonment clause stood in the way of an effectual enforcement of the law in the matter of securing evidence.

It was not thought, Mr. President—the Senator may think differently, and we shall be glad to hear from him on that at the proper time—it was not thought by the committee, nor by the Senate at that time, that we could for the same offense have different punishments, and inasmuch as we were undertaking to reach the corporation itself, as well as the individual, the imprisonment feature was dropped out. But I personally had nothing to do with that part of the Elkins law; I think every member of the committee will sustain me in that statement. I simply adopted the views of others in that respect.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think I must call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The first bill on the Calendar will be stated.

Mr. HALE. Has the request of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] for printing certain papers been passed upon?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request of the Senator from Ohio has been granted.

IMPORTATION OF IMPURE AND UNWHOLESOME TEA.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the regular order, then, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 1548) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea," approved March 2, 1897, was announced as first in order.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, is there a report accompanying that bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that there is a report accompanying the bill. It will be read at the request of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] who has the bill in charge is not in his seat, and it will be impossible to now complete its consideration. So I think it had better go over in the absence of the Senator, and then I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill will go over.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. Now, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, December 21, 1905, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 20, 1905.

ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSIONER.

Joseph Bucklin Bishop for appointment as a member of the Isthmian Canal Commission, provided for by the act of Congress aproved June 28, 1902, entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans."

CONSULS-GENERAL.

Alfred L. M. Gottschalk, of New York, now consul-general at Callao, to be consul-general of the United States at Mexico, Mexico, vice James R. Parsons, jr., deceased.

Frank Dillingham, of California, now consul at Aix la Chapelle, to be consul-general of the United States at Coburg, Germany, vice Henry D. Saylor, resigned.

DISTRICT ATTORNEY.

Samuel Platt, of Nevada, to be United States attorney for the district of Nevada, vice Sardis Summerfield, whose term will expire January 12, 1906.

MARSHAL.

Leo E. Bennett, of the Indian Territory, to be United States marshal for the western district of Indian Territory. (A reappointment, his term expiring January 9, 1906.)

COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

Alfred L. Sharpe, of Texas, to be collector of customs for the district of Paso del Norte, in the State of Texas, to succeed Patrick F. Garrett, whose term of office expired by limitation December 19, 1905.

Charles M. Webster, of Montana, to be collector of customs for the district of Montana and Idaho, in the States of Montana and Idaho. (Reappointment.)

RECEIVERS OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

Arthur H. Swain, of California, to be receiver of public moneys at Visalia, Cal., his term having expired December 18, 1905. (Reappointment.)

Nathaniel H. Alexander, of Alabama, to be receiver of public moneys at Montgomery, Ala., to take effect January 19, 1906, at the expiration of his term. (Reappointment.)

PENSION AGENT.

William R. Warnock, of Urbana, Ohio, to be pension agent at Columbus, Ohio, vice Joseph W. Jones, term expired and resigned.

POSTMASTERS.

DELAWARE.

John A. Jolls to be postmaster at Middletown, in the county of Newcastle and State of Delaware, in place of John W. Jolls, deceased.

ILLINOIS.

Harold E. Chadwick to be postmaster at Ashton, in the county of Lee and State of Illinois, in place of Cassius K. Northrup, removed.

William R. Jewell to be postmaster at Danville, in the county of Vermilion and State of Illinois, in place of William R. Jewell. Incumbent's commission expired December 18, 1905.

Charles W. Warner to be postmaster at Hoopeston, in the county of Vermilion and State of Illinois, in place of Charles W. Warner. Incumbent's commission expired December 18, 1905.

INDIANA.

William L. Bryan to be postmaster at Boonville, in the county of Warrick and State of Indiana, in place of William L. Bryan. Incumbent's commission expired December 12, 1905.

William A. Dennerline to be postmaster at Aurora, in the county of Dearborn and State of Indiana, in place of Ernest H. Niebaum. Incumbent's commission expires January 9, 1906.

James F. Lawson to be postmaster at Spencer, in the county of Owen and State of Indiana, in place of James F. Lawson. Incumbent's commission expired December 12, 1905.

Morris B. Pote to be postmaster at New Harmony, in the county of Posey and State of Indiana, in place of Morris B. Pote. Incumbent's commission expired December 12, 1905.

Rankin C. Walkup to be postmaster at Crawfordsville, in the county of Montgomery and State of Indiana, in place of Marshall M. Nye. Incumbent's commission expired December 12, 1905.

IOWA.

William F. Stahl to be postmaster at Lisbon, in the county of Linn and State of Iowa, in place of William F. Stahl. Incumbent's commission expired December 13, 1903.

John H. Wegerslev to be postmaster at Alta, in the county of Buena Vista and State of Iowa, in place of Christian H. Wegerslev, resigned.

John M. Wormley to be postmaster at Kingsley, in the county of Plymouth and State of Iowa, in place of Luther Conklin, resigned.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Frank P. Goss to be postmaster at Hyannis, in the county of Barnstable and State of Massachusetts, in place of Frank P. Goss. Incumbent's commission expired December 17, 1905.

George W. Jones to be postmaster at Falmouth, in the county of Barnstable and State of Massachusetts, in place of George W. Jones. Incumbent's commission expired December 17, 1905.

Francis Norwood to be postmaster at Beverly, in the county of Essex and State of Massachusetts, in place of Francis Norwood. Incumbent's commission expired December 17, 1905.

NEW YORK.

Dwight H. Bruce to be postmaster at Syracuse, in the county of Onondaga and State of New York, in place of Dwight H. Bruce. Incumbent's commission expired December 17, 1905.

Orley W. Closson to be postmaster at Schuylersville, in the county of Saratoga and State of New York, in place of William S. Ostrander, resigned.

George W. Hitchcock to be postmaster at Ripley, in the county of Chautauqua and State of New York, in place of George W. Hitchcock. Incumbent's commission expired December 17, 1905.

NORTH DAKOTA.

John I. W. Durston to be postmaster at Bisbee, in the county of Towner and State of North Dakota. Office became Presidential October 1, 1905.

Harry H. Roberts to be postmaster at Tower City, in the county of Cass and State of North Dakota. Office became Presidential October 1, 1905.

OHIO.

Charles E. Hixson to be postmaster at Leesburg, in the county of Highland and State of Ohio. Office became Presidential January 1, 1904.

OKLAHOMA.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 20, 1905.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on H. R. 480.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up the conference report on House bill 480. Does the gentleman desire the statement to be read in lieu of the report?

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to have the statement read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read the report.

[For conference report and statement, see page 608, House proceedings.]

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the formal reading of the conference report will be dispensed with. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I caught the reading aright, one of the Senate amendments strikes out the provision of the House bill requiring these officers to report to Congress at any time that Congress might demand. Is that correct?

Mr. HEPBURN. That is correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What amendment is that?

Mr. HEPBURN. That is the tenth amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman propose the House conferees shall recede from their position upon the question?

Mr. HEPBURN. That is the recommendation of the conference committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we ought to have a vote upon that.

Mr. PAYNE. Might I suggest right there that Congress has the right to call upon these people for information, and what is the use of putting it into this law?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Congress has that right "in a way," and nobody knows better than my friend from New York what that way does. It may bring a reply at any time that in the opinion of the Executive it is "contrary to public policy," like a resolution of mine in the last Congress asking if any steps had been taken to prosecute the men engaged in the Northern Securities deal and anthracite deal. Now, if the language remains as the House left it in the bill that Executive reply could not be returned. Congress would have the right regardless of that. Can not we have a separate vote upon that particular proposition?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think not, sir. I think the conference report is a whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman if he can yield to me for about three minutes?

Mr. HEPBURN. I will yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that we ought on this side of the Chamber to allow this matter to go without at least an explanation. I have just called to the attention of the House one feature in the report which will be adopted, if the report is adopted, which I think ought not to be. In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, this bill contains a very objectionable feature, to which attention was called the other day, to wit, the issue of bonds running posterity in debt, as well as the present generation, rather than to "disturb the equanimity" of national-bank favorites who are depositories of the Government at this moment. Notwithstanding all that, however, such is the interest on this side of the Chamber in the speedy construction of the Panama Canal, such is its sincere desire not to appear even to throw any obstacles in its pathway, so much greater does it think the great end to be achieved than any means—even objectionable—pursued in arriving at it, that I at any rate will not oppose the adoption of the conference report at this time. I did, however, want to call the attention of the country to these things, so they would understand that while adopting it, it is in a manner under protest that we do it. We can not stand everything always.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HEPBURN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 93. An act to amend section 2326 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to mining claims;

S. 68. An act for the widening of a section of Columbia road east of Sixteenth street;

S. 55. An act for the widening of Bladensburg road, and for other purposes;

S. 51. An act to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia;

S. 1370. An act for the relief of William H. Hugo, deceased;

S. 955. An act authorizing the city of Nome, a municipal corporation organized and existing under chapter 21, title 3, of an act of Congress approved June 6, 1900, entitled "An act making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes," to construct a free bridge across the Snake River at Nome City, in the Territory of Alaska;

S. 653. An act to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Illinois;

S. 280. An act to provide a life-saving station at or near Greenhill, on the coast of South Kingston, in the State of Rhode Island; and

S. 312. An act to extend the time for the completion of a bridge across the Missouri River at Yankton, S. Dak.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 312. An act to extend the time for the completion of a bridge across the Missouri River at Yankton, S. Dak.—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 280. An act to provide a life-saving station at or near Greenhill, on the coast of South Kingston, in the State of Rhode Island—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 653. An act to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Illinois—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

S. 955. An act authorizing the city of Nome, a municipal corporation organized and existing under chapter 21, Title III, of an act of Congress approved June 6, 1900, entitled "An act making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes," to construct a free bridge across the Snake River at Nome city, in the Territory of Alaska—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 51. An act to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 55. An act for the widening of Bladensburg road, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 68. An act for the widening of a section of Columbia road east of Sixteenth street—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 93. An act to amend section 2326 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to mining claims—to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

STENOGRAPHER FOR COMMITTEE.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions be authorized to appoint a stenographer for said committee for the Fifty-ninth Congress, at a salary of $6 per day, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SULLOWAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

RAILROAD IN ALASKA.

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for present consideration of House bill No. 99.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for present consideration of House bill No. 99, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time of the Council City and Solomon River Railroad Company to comply with the provisions of sections 4 and 5 of chapter 299 of the laws of the United States, entitled "An act extending the homestead laws and providing for the right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved May 14, 1898, in acquiring and completing its railroad now under construction in Alaska, is hereby extended as follows:

First. That the time to file the map and profile of definite location of its first section of at least 20 miles with the register of the land office in the district of Alaska, as provided in said sections 4 and 5, is hereby extended to and including the 31st day of December, 1906.

Second. That the time to complete the first section of at least 20 miles of its railroad, as provided in said section 5, is hereby extended to and including the 31st day of December, 1906, and the time for completing its entire railroad, as provided in said section 5, is hereby extended to and including December 31, 1909.

Third. That it shall be lawful for the Council City and Solomon River Railroad Company to hereafter operate its railroad in the district of Alaska for a period to and including December 31, 1909, without the payment of the license fee of $100 per mile per annum on each mile operated, as provided in section 29 of chapter 1 of the act entitled "An act for making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1900.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if this bill has been reported favorably by a committee?

Mr. BRICK. It has been unanimously reported favorably by the Committee on Territories sitting as a full committee.

Mr. SULZER. I would also like to know, Mr. Speaker, where this railroad is to be built in Alaska.

Mr. BRICK. It is built on the Seward Peninsula, proposed to run from Council City to Solomon City, about 50 miles, with the ultimate idea of building farther from that after this line between those two cities has been completed.

Mr. SULZER. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman make an explanation of the necessity for this legislation—the reason for it.

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Speaker, in stating the reason for this bill at this time I will have to go back to the last session, at which time the privilege was given that this railroad would build 10 miles a year, and that privilege was given releasing it from taxation up to the time it was built and could obtain revenues, so that they would at least have the equity of having the railroad running at the time they were being licensed and paying a license tax. Now, they built 18⅝ miles up to December this year under the last statute. They should have built 20 miles to comply with the statute, and for that reason it has been desired to get unanimous consent and to give them an extension of a year, so that they would not forfeit the million dollars they have already spent in building the 18⅝ miles when it was contemplated by the statute to build 20 miles up to this December. The reason they did not finish the 20 miles was that last year, instead of having the ordinary time that the climate of Alaska gives them of four months, they only had three months. The cold weather came a month earlier than anticipated. There was a great flood also, which washed away 2½ miles of their railroad and 150 feet of their bridge of eight or nine hundred feet across the Solomon River, so that they were precluded by the weather from carrying out their contract. They now have ties and railroad iron sufficient upon the ground to build 35 miles of railroad. They have expended a million dollars. If there is any one thing in the world that Alaska needs, it is people who are in good faith trying to build railroads there. A million dollars expended in 18⅝ miles shows the good faith of this company, and so for that reason it has seemed to your committee proper that they be given an extension of one more year in order to save themselves.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. This extension of time is not for the purpose of giving them authority to build, is it? The time limit in which they may build has not yet expired, I think.

Mr. BRICK. It expires if they do not finish their 20 miles this December.

Mr. MANN. How does the gentleman mean that it expires? Will they not still have the right to build the road?

Mr. BRICK. No; they will forfeit their right.

Mr. MANN. So the time in which they were to build the road limits it within a certain time?

Mr. BRICK. To finish 20 miles was limited.

Mr. MANN. To December this year?

Mr. BRICK. To finish 20 miles in order to obtain something.

Mr. MANN. But the right to build the road was not limited, was it?

Mr. BRICK. Yes; the statute of last year limited their rights of franchise—their rights to build the road—unless they built 10 miles a year, and they had already built 10 miles, and the 10 miles this year would make it 20 miles up to December, which is the termination of their rights.

Mr. MANN. This statute also extends their right to be exempt from the license fee, I take it.

Mr. BRICK. Just for one year.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman another question. In the course of my mail I received a circular letter, which I read. Undoubtedly the gentleman received it. I do not know whether he happened to read it or not. It was from somebody interested in the Alaskan roads. It was for the purpose of obtaining subscriptions for stock or something of that kind, hence it may be viewed with some suspicion; but in it the statement was made—and I am not sure whether it came from the people behind this road or not—that a road already opened to a certain point had more than paid for its whole cost in sixty days.

Mr. BRICK. That is not this road.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think the statement was either made about this road or else the circular was about this; but there were two roads, were there not?

Mr. TAWNEY. Is not that the White Pass road?

Mr. MANN. I do not know the names of the railroads, I will say to the distinguished gentleman. But here is a circular letter, I am inclined to think of the people behind this road, for the purpose of selling their stock, telling how very profitable it had proved. In the circular it was stated the road which had been built there was so profitable that, in the course of sixty days, the receipts more than paid the total cost of construction. Now, if the road is so profitable as that I do not think it is necessary to exempt them from the payment of the license fee.

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is mistaken as to the road. This road has not made any such profit. It is the Valdez road that the circular referred to. I will ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] to make a statement about it.

Mr. MANN. The circular referred to two roads. The circular was endeavoring to sell the stock of one road, as I remember it, and cited the instance of the other road. How many roads are there?

Mr. PAYNE. The other road is the White Pass road, which is about 110 miles long.

Mr. BRICK. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois I know from credible and the best information possible that it is not true as to this road, whatever they put in their circular. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] was over this road last summer, and I would ask him to make an explanation about it.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman receive such a circular as I refer to, or does he recollect it?

Mr. BRICK. I do not recollect any such circular being sent to me.

Mr. MANN. Has he heard of such a circular being sent?

Mr. BRICK. I have heard of the circular.

Mr. MANN. Was it a circular sent out in behalf of this road?

Mr. BRICK. Oh, no. It is the Valdez road, as I stated before.

Mr. MANN. I am not able to differentiate between the Valdez road and this road.

Mr. BRICK. This is the Seward Peninsula road, running to Solomon City.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. BRICK. I do.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw any objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LACEY. I think there ought to be some explanation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I was about to ask the gentleman——

Mr. LACEY. A few words of explanation in regard to this road. This road is a little road about 13 miles long, leading from the Solomon River in the direction of Council City. I was over that road this year. I came over it going to Chinik and by way of Fish River and Neukulue River to Ophir Creek, and going back by way of East Fork, and from East Fork to Bering Sea at Solomon River this little road is 13 miles long and of standard gauge.

Mr. BRICK. Eighteen miles.

Mr. LACEY. There are some side tracks that I presume they count in the length of the road. There is the White Pass road, which goes through the White Pass and by sled stage in winter from White Horse to Dawson, and by the Yukon River in summer. This road, to which the gentleman is referring as having paid for itself, has only about 23 miles in the United States; the balance of the 110 or 116 miles are in the Yukon Territory in the British possessions. That road has not only been very profitable, having paid large dividends from the time it started, but will continue to do so as long as the business of that whole country passes over it. The little road in question is intended to connect the mines on Ophir Creek with the sea. It is a road that will not pay so much. The White Pass road runs to a country where there is winter mining, and on the Ophir Creek it is purely surface mining and therefore work can not be done in the winter. As to the road to which the gentleman alludes, the proposed road from Valdez, going out in the direction of the copper country, no part of it has been built, but I understand some clearing of the timber has been done, but no part of the railroad has yet been built. The other road to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] refers, commences at Resurrection Bay, and they built 25 miles of it last year and this year built 25 or 30 more, and they have much material on the ground for extension next year.

There is nothing carried over this new road except the material to construct the road. It has not reached the coal mines, and it has, as yet, no business in the interior. It is still 150 or 200 miles from the copper mines, and during the next two or three years its business will be confined to the shipment of its own rails, its own ties, and its own supplies.

We are trying to get railroads and wagon roads in Alaska, and we have by legislation said that a road like this while being constructed must pay a license tax of $100 a year for every mile of road. The White Pass road is paying about $2,300 a year, because there is that much of the line in the United States. The other roads pay $100 a year per mile, which is a partial embargo against the construction of new roads in that region.

Gentlemen from Alaska met in convention not long ago in Seattle and passed a resolution asking this Congress to entirely relieve all of these roads during the period of their construction from the payment of this tax, so as to encourage the building of railroads in Alaska. This exception to the White Pass road might well be made, because that is an old road built years ago and very prosperous, very successful in its business, and does business throughout the entire year.

The little Solomon River road, to which my friend from Indiana refers, is one in competition with the flatboat transportation on the Neukluk River during the summer. I made the trip last summer, going up in a flatboat to Council City, and then by a little branch road, 8 miles to Ophir Creek, coming back across the tundra to East Fork, and thence by this railway to the sea. This road begins where there is no population and runs out this far into the interior in the direction of Council City. It ought to be built clear through to Council City, but they ought not to have the penalty of paying $100 a mile on that little road while in the process of construction.

Mr. BRICK. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD].

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, under existing law in Alaska every railroad is required to pay $100 per mile license for every year during the time it is being built. A bill was before the last Congress providing that this little road now under construction should be exempted from the tax for five years, within which it was expected the road could be constructed. They required it, however, to build 10 miles each year, in order for it to get the benefit of that exemption of tax. During the summer they undertook to construct that 10 miles. They contracted for 13 miles instead of 10, and, if they had carried out their plans, they would have had 23 miles instead of 20. But, a few days after beginning their work, a great flood, the greatest flood in that portion of the country for years, washed out a mile and a half of the road already constructed, and also washed out a part of two of the principal bridges which they had along the road already constructed. By the time the flood was over and they got the repairs made on that part which had already been built, it was impossible for them to construct the 13 miles of road. Another remarkable thing occurred. That country froze up nearly thirty days earlier than is usual; it froze up in September instead of October, and after the freezing it was impossible for them to construct any part of the road. So, up to the present time they have 18⅔ miles of road instead of 20 miles of road. The sole purpose of this bill is to permit an exception to apply to them notwithstanding they have not built the 10 miles of road this year.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BRICK. Does the gentleman from Missouri wish for more time?

Mr. LLOYD. I would like time to answer the question.

Mr. BRICK. I yield sufficient time for the gentleman to answer the question.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri what would happen to the road if this bill does not pass? They will not tear up the track, will they?

Mr. LLOYD. I suppose not; I imagine the road will go on. As far as the committee is concerned, we are aware of this fact, and the gentleman from Illinois may not be. There have been repeated efforts made to get the United States committed to the aiding of roads in Alaska. There were three bills before Congress in the last session applying for the aiding or helping by financing bonds to the extent of $20,000 a mile on roads to be constructed from Valdez up into the Copper River country. Three different companies were before our committee for that purpose. Thus far the committee has been able to keep down anything that means any expense on the part of the Government for the relief of railroad enterprise that is sought to be carried out; but where there is money actually expended, without any expenditure on the part of the Government, we are disposed to say that they ought to have every encouragement the Government can give them without the expenditure of money to aid them in this enterprise.

Mr. MANN. Now, I have no doubt that the gentleman thinks he answers the question, and I know that he endeavors to, but what he says does not convey to my mind at all an answer to the question that I asked.

Mr. LLOYD. Your question is——

Mr. MANN. What effect it will have on the road if this bill does not pass?

Mr. LLOYD. The road will be required to pay the tax.

Mr. MANN. Then this bill is practically a bill to relieve the railroad from the payment of the tax?

Mr. LLOYD. From the payment of the tax for one year; yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Do they pay a tax to anybody else?

Mr. LLOYD. No, sir.

Mr. MANN. There is no tax paid by the railroad company?

Mr. LLOYD. Nowhere else; no, sir.

Mr. MANN. What this bill seeks to do is to relieve the railroad company from any form of taxation.

Mr. LLOYD. Not forever, but just for this year.

Mr. MANN. Whether for one year or not, it is to relieve the railroad company from any form of taxation for the present.

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; this road which is under construction.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman is able, with his policies and the policies of his party, to favor that proposition? If the gentleman is able to do that, I know he must have good reason for it.

Mr. LLOYD. As far as the "gentleman" is concerned, he is not favoring the railroad, but he is desirous of developing Alaska. If the railroads wish to build their own roads, without asking anything from the Government, the gentleman is willing to help them in every way he can. Now, the law of last year, which was passed, as I understand it, without any objection on the floor of this House, limited the exemption from taxation to five years, and provided that if this road built 10 miles of track each year——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken in saying there was no objection on the floor of the House. There was considerable discussion on this subject on the floor of the House.

Mr. LLOYD. I think you are mistaken about there being any objection to this particular proposition.

Mr. MANN. I remember the discussion very well. The House did pass the bill, however.

Mr. LLOYD. The question is not now whether there was a discussion or not, but the question is whether, the road having met with these misfortunes, the House is willing to exempt this company from the tax which would not be imposed if they had built 10 miles of road. They have 18⅜ miles of road built, according to the testimony that came before us, and if there were 20 miles built there would have been no question about their being exempt from this taxation; but since they only have 18⅜ miles, it becomes necessary for them to pay the tax unless they are exempted by Congress. As their misfortunes came by the act of God, it looks as though it is nothing but right that the company should have the benefit of this exemption.

Mr. MANN. If they had paid the tax and had come before Congress to have the tax refunded they would not receive the consideration of anybody on this side of the Chamber and very few on the other side.

Mr. LLOYD. I rather think that proposition is true.

Mr. MANN. What is the difference between a proposition to relieve them from the payment of a tax which the law requires them to pay and, because of exceptional circumstances, a proposition to refund a tax which has been paid?

Mr. LLOYD. I do not understand what the gentleman is seeking to reach in this particular matter.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask a question.

Mr. LLOYD. As far as I am concerned, and speaking for the minority on the committee, who have investigated the matter, we are willing that this company shall be exempt from the tax and that they shall be excused from the building of the 1⅝ miles of road this year.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask the gentleman whether, with the exception of the White Pass road, which, so far as Alaska is concerned, is fully completed and entirely successful, all the other railroads projected and being built there ought not to be relieved from taxation for the next five years?

Mr. LLOYD. I am not willing to go that far.

Mr. LACEY. And is it not true that the extension of these roads is discouraged by this license tax?

Mr. LLOYD. The White Pass road, as far as I understand, is a paying investment; and if it is, there ought not to be any exemption from taxation. The White Pass road is already constructed.

Mr. LACEY. I say the roads, with the exception of the White Pass road, ought to be relieved, ought they not, at least during the period of their construction?

Mr. LLOYD. Well, there is no other road——

Mr. LACEY. Yes; there is the Wildgoose road on Ophir Creek; there is the Nome Arctic road, from Nome north; there is the Valdez road, from Valdez; there is the Resurrection Bay road, and there are a number of roads projected there, all of them either in process of construction or are soon to be, and they must be built a long distance before they can realize anything. Some railway lines are asking subsidies in Alaska. Certainly these roads not asking aid might be very properly relieved from a license tax during the period of construction.

Mr. LLOYD. That question is not before the House. When it is I will be glad to answer the question the best I can. We have not investigated that proposition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask a question about this bill.

Mr. BRICK. Very well, I will answer it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The act of January, 1905, exempted this railroad from taxation for five years after the passage of this act.

Mr. BRICK. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Requiring the road to build 10 miles each year.

Mr. BRICK. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This bill, I understand, first removes the necessity of building the 10 miles during this present year. Does it extend the period of exemption beyond the original five years?

Mr. BRICK. No; it extends for this 10 miles which is not fully completed for this year, and requires the whole road to be built by 1909, and it only asks that the taxes or license fee be exempt while they are earning no money, while they are building their road. I think that answers the question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it does not. The act of January, 1905, provides that this railroad shall be exempted from taxation for the period of five years after the passage of that act. It requires that in order that the road should get the benefit of that exemption it should complete 10 miles each year, and if it built more than 10 miles in any one year certain buildings should be credited to the succeeding year. This bill before the House now removes from the company the necessity of having at the end of this year 20 miles of the road. Does it also extend the period of five years during which the road will be exempt from taxation?

Mr. BRICK. It extends it one year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Beyond the original five years?

Mr. BRICK. Beyond the original five years, because it can not be completed and because the act of God swept away their track and they could not complete their 20 miles within this year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. BRICK. Just a moment, Mr. Speaker. I submit that it is too late for the objection to come. We have debated the question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I reserved the right to object.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent was not given.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I submit that debate followed after the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] withdrew his objection, before there was any objection, or any right to object reserved.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] immediately reserved the right to object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserved the right to object when I got the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman proceeded by unanimous consent in effect to answer the questions. The right to object was reserved, and the House did not give the unanimous consent up to this time. The Chair was watching pretty closely, and if he had had an opportunity to say that the House gave unanimous consent the Chair would have announced that very promptly. Objection is heard.

PHILIPPINE REVENUE.

Mr. PAYNE, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. 3) to amend an act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 8, 1902; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the bill which has just been reported, it was agreed in committee, and I wish to have the agreement spread upon the RECORD so that there may be no danger of misunderstanding, that the minority upon the committee shall have until Thursday at 5 o'clock p. m., whether the House be then in session or not, to file the minority substitute bill and the minority report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the minority shall have until Thursday afternoon next, at 5 o'clock, to file its views with the Clerk of the House, whether the House be in session at 5 o'clock or not. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House, I desire to say that I shall call this bill up and try to proceed to its consideration on January 4, 1906, when the House meets after the holiday recess.

I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House resolution No. 42, and pending that, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all general debate on this resolution close to-day when the committee rises.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that, and for this reason: There is a question to be determined of reference, and a great many Members of the House have gone home already for the holidays and many more will go to-morrow, so I hope the vote upon the question of reference will not be taken until after the holidays when they return.

Mr. PAYNE. I will say to the gentleman I do not propose to press that; I do not think I could if I wanted to, as I do not think there will be a quorum, but I would like to close general debate and then there will be opportunity for debate on the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman suggest to close general debate to-morrow, say, at 5 o'clock?

Mr. PAYNE. I said to-day, anticipating many may not be here to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose the gentleman modifies that request and make it to-morrow at 5 o'clock.

Mr. PAYNE. I will make that request, and say that to-morrow afternoon when the House adjourns general debate shall be considered as closed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to close general debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on House resolution No. 42 to-morrow at adjournment, whether the committee sits or not. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

So the motion was agreed to; and thereupon the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House resolution No. 42, Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House resolution No. 42, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] is recognized.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, inasmuch as I do not want to be out of fashion, I propose to make my remarks along the lines that others have made theirs since this discussion began, and you may therefore prejudge that they will embrace a medley of subjects. In the matter of the reference of that part of the President's message that refers to insurance, that has been under discussion for several days, I, in common with others, have my individual views.

If it were not, Mr. Chairman, that we thought differently, there would be no questions for us to assemble here to dispose of from time to time, because our similar ideas would lead to but one conclusion, no dissension anywhere, and hence we could dispose of the subjects that we are sent here to dispose of by proxy and let them go at that.

In my humble judgment, the insurance feature of the President's message ought to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary as a business proposition. When we come to legislate, we ought to do it on a business plane, along business lines, not in a scattering or guesswork manner, as it were. It strikes me that if we refer it to the Committee on Ways and Means it would be a guesswork proceeding. No member of that committee seems to know what to do with it, unless it be that when they get it they could evolve something out of it that would produce revenue. I can not see how taxing the insurance companies will amount to anything in controlling them, unless it be that they are to be taxed out of existence. To simply lay a tax upon them would do the companies no hurt, for if you taxed them $10,000,000 each per annum the policy holders and not the companies would have to pay it.

Such a tax would add considerably to the revenue of this country, and we would all be glad to welcome $10,000,000 into the Treasury at this particular time of revenue shortage from each of these companies if it came out of their fraudulent coffers instead of out of the orphan's penury and the widow's mite.

But there is no danger of the insurance business being legally regulated by taxation, for nowhere within the lids of the Constitution of the United States is there anything that tends to indicate that the Congress has authority to tax individuals or corporations for the purpose of regulation. Therefore it seems that it is unnecessary to argue longer that the Ways and Means Committee is not the proper committee to which to refer this particular question of insurance, to which the President has so lucidly referred in his annual message to this body.

But, sir, it has been claimed that it ought to go to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I can not see why. Certainly under the decisions of the Supreme Court insurance is not commerce, and inasmuch as the Interstate Commerce Committee has no other authority than that of dealing with the commerce of the country it seems entirely out of place to talk about sending this part of the message to that committee. I think it would be wiser to refer it to the Post-Office Committee than to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, because there they might deal with it along the lines of the get-rich-quick propositions. We notice, Mr. Chairman, that the post-office authorities have power, whenever they know of any concern that is organized, corporation or otherwise, for the purpose of getting rich quick by defrauding those who patronize such institutions, to issue a fraud order and in that way get rid of the obnoxious imposition. Sir, if the proceedings of the insurance companies, the three great insurance companies of the United States, for the past several years, according to the evidence that has been adduced before the committee that is now investigating them in the city of New York, do not show them to be get-rich-quick concerns, then I do not know the meaning of the term. They have certainly been getting rich quick according to the reports that have come to our ears, telling of the vast sums that have been illegally appropriated to the use and benefit of the companies and their thieving officers, to the eternal injury of the policy holders and their beneficiaries. Their officers have defrauded the policy holders by the misappropriation of trust funds, and hence are embezzlers under the laws of any State of the Union. If that does not call for a fraud order, I would like to know what sort of conduct would call for one.

But, sir, it seems to be a doubtful question as to whether this Government has any authority whatever to deal with the great insurance corporations. Therefore, as long as there is doubt about that, there can be no doubt about the committee that the insurance part of the President's message should go to. It has always been the rule in all legislative bodies, whenever legislation is initiated that indicates that it would be in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, or of the States, that the Judiciary is the proper committee for it to be referred to, where questions of that kind are considered and determined and the proper report made thereon. Therefore the motion, which I understand is to be made, to refer this resolution to the Judiciary Committee, with instructions to report back to this body its findings, will be the proper motion, in my judgment, and it ought to prevail.

Certainly, sir, the insurance companies need some check upon their reckless course. If they have misappropriated trust funds, they have been profligate in the use of money that was placed in their hands to be given back to the policy holders or their beneficiaries as a dividend, and, sir, when they misappropriate trust funds by way of paying excessive salaries; when they misappropriate by way of speculation, or when they misappropriate it by placing it in the campaign fund of a political party to corrupt voters, their officers have simply committed the heinous crime of embezzlement and ought to be shrouded in stripes the balance of their unworthy lives. And the strong arm of the law of the proper jurisdiction should take hold of the companies themselves and either regulate or banish them.

But, from the arguments that have been presented here by learned lawyers, and the knowledge we all have of the Constitution of the United States, and of the powers reserved by the States to themselves when the Union was created, we are satisfied that it is within the province of the State, and not of the nation, to control insurance companies. In my own State, sir, we have an insurance law that prohibits the transaction of business by any insurance company that is in a pool to fix prices, made anywhere on earth for the purpose of doing business anywhere on earth, in Arkansas, as long as that pool exists. Sir, that has driven the old-line insurance companies that are in a pool to fix insurance prices from the borders of our State; and if the State of Arkansas has the power to do that as to the fire insurance corporations, why has it not the power to enact a law that will do the very same thing for the life insurance companies? I will answer the question myself, sir. It has the power, and so has every other State in the Union of States.

Sirs, I am persuaded that the disclosures made by the legislative committee in New York in their examination of this great question will awaken the conscience of the legislators of that State, to the end that a law may be enacted at the next session of the legislature that will either control or banish the insurance companies that are now organized and doing business in that State. If that is done this whole matter will be settled; the question will be solved, and insurance will come back to what it was wont to be in its incipiency, a protection, and not a fortune-making business.

Sir, again, I am inclined to think that the new officers that have been selected to preside over the destinies of these companies will certainly be a little more careful, will be a little wiser in the discharge of the duties they have assumed, and especially so the president of the Equitable Association, who was given a certificate of good character by the President of the United States when he sent him from his Cabinet to become president of that institution. Sir, he will not be unmindful of the certificate of good character that the President gave him, to the extent of being willing to commit any act that will reflect upon the certificate or the man who so cordially gave it.

But, Mr. Chairman, this question, as I said, ought to be settled by the States. It is a States rights question that none of us can get away from, and that none of us who believe in the doctrine of independence ought to be willing to take from the States and give to any other power on earth. The States have complete power, under existing constitutions, to deny a corporation the privilege of doing business within its confines upon any terms, and hence have power to say upon what terms they shall do business within them. To take such power from the States by amendment of the National Constitution would be a long step toward centralization of government, and a well-aimed blow at the liberty-revering principle of States rights. I for one, am not ready to believe the people's Representatives, who command the confidence of eighty million loyal patriots, would rob their respective Commonwealths of the power that they have under their own constitutions and under the Constitution of the nation. Being a States rights advocate, wanting to preserve every privilege and every power to the States that I possibly can that is consistent with good order and good government throughout the nation, I protest against the thought of conceding the right of this Government to control the insurance institutions of this country.

A gentleman of the committee said very properly the other day—the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]—that if you take the insurance control out of the hands of the States, then and there you take the adjudication of all causes with them out of the local courts. And, sir, the widows and orphans who are to be benefited by the policies of insurance would have to go into the United States court to collect them whenever payment, from any technical or vicious cause, was refused. To do so would often take them great distances from their homes, at great expense and inconvenience to themselves. I think adjustments ought to be made by local courts upon questions of this kind, and not put upon litigants the burden of having to go among strangers, at great inconvenience and expense, in order to get their rights adjudicated, when they, and those from whom they take, have lived up to every feature of the contract that they are forced by a soulless corporation to sue upon.

We know the character of these great corporations. Whether they believe they can defeat a claim or not, they will litigate in many instances for the purpose of delay, for the purpose of withholding the money, possibly to force a compromise that would be to their advantage. Sir, I am violently opposed to any action that would bring about such an unfortunate and unfriendly condition to the insurance beneficiaries of my own proud State, and hence protest most seriously against any effort on the part of Congress to commit an act that would for a single moment take from the States of this Union any of the power they now have to control the insurance associations of the land that come to their borders for the transaction of insurance business.

Mr. Chairman, I will now leave the insurance question to the better judgment of the members of the committee and proceed to discuss the subject of railroad-rate legislation for a short time. I am in hearty sympathy with the President of the United States in his desire to have the Interstate Commerce Commission given power to regulate rates whenever it finds them to be unreasonable, unjust, or discriminatory in their character. Sir, I applaud his every utterance upon that line, because they are right; and I care not from whom righteous utterances come, they are to be commended by an honest political foe as well as by friend. I believe the President of the United States intends to do right upon all questions. I believe his every purpose is to be President of the whole people of this Union regardless of locality or condition, and his only shortcoming seems to be that he sometimes allows the great corporations and trust interests of the country to "pull the wool over his eyes" for a season; for instance, when he allowed the "stand-patters" upon the subjects of the tariff and railroad-rate regulation to prevent him from calling an extra session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, in accordance with his openly and often expressed purpose.

In his recommendation to this body the President in his message to Congress says, in terms, that the Interstate Commerce Commission "ought to be given the power to substitute a just and reasonable rate whenever, upon hearing, it finds that the railroads have fixed an unjust and unreasonable rate, such rate so substituted by the Interstate Commerce Commission to remain the rate unless and until it is reversed by a court of competent jurisdiction."

That sounds right in every sense of the word. It is true that the railroads take issue with him. Why not? I have never known a corporation, or an individual, so far as that is concerned, who was engaged in wrongdoing, who was exceeding the authority that he or it possessed, but what complained whenever any authority, any power, saw fit to call a halt upon their wayward course. Take a criminal, and he does not think the legislatures of the States ought to pass any law that would interfere with his wicked acts. Take the evilly disposed corporations, and they think they ought to be given a loose rein, that the bridle ought to be taken off so far as they are concerned and they left to do their worst.

They argue ingeniously in many instances when presenting their cause. Note some of their objections. The president of the Southern Railroad some months ago undertook to prejudice the Representatives of the South against the Esch-Townsend bill by saying that to pass that measure would take from the people of the South the right by State legislation to provide for separate coaches for the two races. I wonder if he thought we were a lot of fools in the South. Certainly he did not believe that we were destitute of legal learning. We are wedded to the proposition of separate coaches for the two races, and we have sense enough to know that under the Constitution of the United States, and under he constitutions of our own States, we have power to pass and enforce a law providing for separate coaches and that Congress can not interfere therewith.

Therefore, sir, I have no fear upon that ground, and there is nothing in that idle threat to deter us in our determination to stand by the President in his declaration upon the subject of railroad-rate regulation. It is consistent with every declaration of the Democratic party upon the subject, and hence there is no reason why we should be deterred in the performance of our duty simply because a Republican President indorses the position of our own party upon the subject.

But the railroads, in their arguments, proceed on the theory, Mr. Chairman, that if the power be given to the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates they will go into the rate-making business specifically. Nobody contemplates any such authority being given it. Nobody understands for a moment that if it is given such authority as the President recommends the Interstate Commerce Commission is going to get right down to rate making as a business. It is understood that the Commission is to have only such power as will permit it to substitute a reasonable or just rate whenever it finds that the railroads have fixed a rate whereby any community or individual will be prejudiced.

The Commission must be given power to say to the railroad, "You shall not discriminate against this community in favor of that, or in favor of this business as against that business." That far it will go, and no farther. And yet the railroads proclaim from the house top that the Government is going into the rate-making business, and that in doing so it is fixing to destroy them; that whenever the Commission is given the power to fix and substitute rates their property will be confiscated; that their rights and privileges will be taken from them. Nothing of that kind is intended by anyone who is in favor of rate regulation.

The railroads contend, Mr. Chairman, that they know more about rate making than anyone else. I suppose they do. Persons who have been long engaged in a given business are better informed concerning everything that pertains to that business than are others; but we find that we have learned men in this country who can very easily adapt themselves to different kinds of business when called upon to do so.

Therefore a President chosen by the people will, in my judgment, select only the kind of men that will be able to enter into the matter of fixing substitute rates that will be fair to both railroad and shipper without material delay or unusual embarrassment.

For nearly ten years the Commission thought it had power to substitute a reasonable or just rate for an unreasonable or unjust one, and it proceeded tc substitute without let or hindrance wherever it found them to be discriminatory in their character, but in no instance did rates substituted by the Commission become confiscators of railroad property or railroad rights.

The railroads seem to forget, Mr. Chairman, that the people have any rights at all when it comes to dealing with powerful corporations. They seem to think that they have rights that are paramount to the rights of the people whenever their interests clash in any degree.

Sir, they forget that they have been kindly given certain privileges under the law that human beings do not enjoy. They forget that by law they are given a perpetual life—something that God in His goodness did not accord to man. They forget, sir, that they are exempt from many of the petty persecutions or prosecutions to which man is subjected. They forget that they are excused from unhappy conditions that require the benefit of clergy, but they do not seem to understand that we know that the reason of it is because the peculiar office of clergy is to administer to souls. [Applause and laughter.]

The railroads, sir, forget that we by law have given them the right to extend their selfish trail through homes that are as sacred to the owner as the grave. They forget that we have given to them the right to ignore all boundary lines and all directions. The individual can not ignore the sacredness of the home or ignore the boundary lines of his neighbor without suffering the severe pains and penalties of the law.

It is true that the railroads must go into court to obtain such benefits, but they get them whenever they petition for them. Angels could get no more at the hands of the courts. Is it possible that beneficiaries who have received such superior benefits at the hands of the people are now afraid of their generous benefactors, or is it that they have grown so greedy and great that they now propose to declare themselves their masters and give them a kick at every turn of the road?

Sir, their arguments against rate substitution by the Commission are so transparent and inconsistent that it easily enables us to understand and appreciate that they are simply trying to hoodwink the people of this country, so that they will not become aroused to the point of studying the question for themselves, knowing full well that if they do enter upon an investigation of the conditions as they actually exist they will rise up in their might and scourge them from their temple of usurped and arrogant power.

I have before me one of the various "missionary tracts" which they have sent to the various Members of Congress. I suppose each and every one of you have received as many as a quarter of a dozen of these. I did, and I have received many pounds of this sort of literature. One book, I remember, was gotten up very much like a novel, as if it were a publication of that attractive character.

One of the arguments presented in this little "tract" is that we ought not to interfere with the railroads by giving the Commission power to substitute rates because we would prevent their making special rates here and there in order to build up certain industries and give value to certain materials or products. I will read from this pamphlet a few of their fallacious reasons as to why their rates should not be interfered with. It is styled "The facts about railroad rates."

One of the countless forms of this means by which railroads develop traffic occurred not long ago in Indiana.

Perhaps some of the Indiana Representatives may know of this transaction.

A resident of that State acquired control of an invention for making butter dishes from shaved veneer cut from timber. It was discovered that sweet gum, a previously worthless wood, was best adapted to the new industry. A study of the needs of the new business showed that to enable it to be successful a rate 25 per cent lower on this timber than on other kinds was necessary. Such a rate was promptly made, with the result of building up a new and profitable industry, giving employment to labor and capital, and giving value to a natural product that had previously had no value.

Mark these words, gentlemen: "To a natural product that had previously had no value."

Sir, I live in a State where we have a great quantity of sweet gum, about which they write. I know that we have not been able to buy a single thousand of the lumber cut from this particular kind of natural product without paying $10 per thousand for it since the Dingley bill became a law. Therefore, when they say that within the last few years they have discovered that they could give value to a natural product that had heretofore had no value they state something, gentlemen, that they do not expect the people generally to believe; but they think that by making the broad declaration that they have enabled this particular concern to build up its business by giving a 25 per cent cut they will encourage some one to think that his particular locality, or his particular business, will be given a cut which will enable him to increase the value or production of his business, and thereby "catch a sucker" with that sort of selfish bait.

Sir, that is a fallacious statement, because sweet gum could not be bought in the wildest territory in the State I come from for less than $10 a thousand before the Indiana enterprise was organized. It had that value before the rate-making question was a subject of serious discussion. It had a good value long before they thought of producing this kind of argument. It has such a value now that the sawmill owners are growing independent, while the people who buy the lumber are impoverished in proportion to the extra price they have to pay for the gum lumber that they must have to build the ordinary cabin that protects them from the blasts of winter and the floods that fall from God's sky. Mr. Chairman, the Republican high tariff has done more to make the price of gum lumber go up than all of the 25 per cent reductions the railroads have given all of the lumber concerns in the world.

But, sir, let us look at some more of their funny argument. I suppose they wanted to scare the Congressmen from Georgia when they put this particular thing in their little pamphlet:

A merchant in Marietta can ship certain goods to Chattanooga for 15 cents per hundred; to Knoxville for 19 cents per hundred. To ship the same goods to Atlanta he must pay 30 cents per hundred; to Macon, 70 cents per hundred. Atlanta is 20 miles from Marietta, Chattanooga is 128 miles, and yet the Chattanooga merchant pays just one-half the freight the Atlanta merchant does. Why? Because Chattanooga is out of the State and Atlanta is in it. This is merely one of a hundred instances where Georgia points are placed at a positive disadvantage in freight rates because they are located in the State.

I suppose they meant to say that because Atlanta and Macon are located in a State where they have a railroad commission is the reason for this state of things. Sir, if this argument is true, I want to say that Georgia certainly has an inferior railroad commission, because it surely has the power to control all of the rates for the shipment of freight from one point in the State of Georgia to another, and it strikes me that wherever their attention was called to the fact that they had to pay for a distance of 20 miles twice as much as persons living in Chattanooga, 120 miles away, they would call a meeting of the commission at once and change the infamous rate, and say to them, "You can not rob the people of our State in any such way; if you are able to carry a commodity for people of another State 128 miles for 15 cents, 'by the Eternal,' you can not come to our State and rob our people by charging them twice as much for a 20-mile haul." Gentlemen from Georgia, what kind of railroad commission have you in your State?

Why, sir, look at the inconsistency of their argument. Why, if that were the case, are they complaining against giving the Interstate Commerce Commission power to fix rates? Why should they howl about that? They have a commission in Georgia with power to fix rates, and the railroads argue that it is hampering the material interests of that State because they do have the commission. Why is it, if they can get higher rates for themselves in Georgia with a commission than they indicate they could get if there were no commission there, that they do not throw their arms wide open and welcome the proposition of giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to regulate unjust discriminations in freight rates? It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, that that is the course they ought to pursue if they want to be consistent.

They also reach far out in their funny argument, Mr. Chairman, and talk about governmental ownership of railroads, or tell us what happened in Canada, where they have governmental ownership. They say:

Things don't always pan out as the theorists think they will. The government of Canada, after operating the Intercolonial Railway for years at a loss, has just announced an increase of rates all along the line, to the disgust of persons who imagine government ownership means lower rates.

Why that argument? Who is there in this Congress, either branch of it, that is advocating government ownership of railroads?

Sir, if I understand it aright, those of the Members of this body who are favorable to railroads—and I believe all of us are—are trying to keep them from going into the hands of the Government. None of us want the Government to own a single line of railroad. We want the corporations, or the individuals wherever they possess them, to operate them, but we want them to operate them in accordance with wisdom, in accordance with justice to every man alike, recognizing that none should have favoritism extended to them as against their fellows.

They also argue, Mr. Chairman, that we are blessed with lower rates in this country than they are in any other country. That is no argument. I expect we have the best of most everything that is going, so far as that is concerned, because we have a superior citizenship and a Government that surpasses that of any other nation on earth. Therefore I apprehend that because we have lower rates than they have in other countries is no argument at all as to why we should not have the power to fix a given rate when we find that the railroads have fixed an unjust rate; when we find that they have fixed an unreasonable rate; when we find that they have fixed a discriminatory rate.

Sir, one reason we have better rates in this country than they have elsewhere is that the hauls are better here than in other countries. There is no nation on earth that has such long hauls as we have, and they do not have as great hauls as ours in quantity. Where our hauls are measured by the thousands of miles, theirs are measured by the hundreds, and where our freight is measured by carloads or trainloads, theirs is measured by the hundred pounds or the ton. Sir, it looks to me as though we ought to have better rates here than elsewhere if we can furnish them better conditions to haul on than they can elsewhere. Therefore, sir, their argument along that line is not worth the consideration of an idler, even.

I am reminded that they also argue that they are not unjust in fixing their rates, that they are trying to do right, and are doing right according to their contention; but, sir, I am just in receipt of a letter from the Fort Smith traffic bureau, of my

State, that gives a different statement of facts to those presented by the railroads, and as they are interested in a sense, not financially interested to the extent the railroads are, I am bound to take their conclusions or their findings in this matter in preference to the conclusions or findings of the railroads upon the subject. I read on page 3 of the letter:

The traffic problem is not that all rates are in themselves too high, but that gross and damaging discrimination exists as result of unequal adjustment between cities and communities. The duty of a common carrier is to receive and transport, without favoritism or discrimination, goods from one point to another, transportation being subject to such reasonable rules and regulations as may be required.

Cities like St. Louis, Memphis, Kansas City, and Chicago are given a very low basis of freight rates into a certain territory, while, for the same distance, the rates from Little Rock, Fort Smith, Texarkana, etc., are from 25 to 50 per cent higher. Such basis acts as a direct discrimination in restraint of interstate commerce against the smaller cities to the benefit of the larger.

To illustrate, we will take the dry-goods interests, five large wholesale houses being located at Fort Smith, with more than one-half million capital invested. Cotton piece goods is an important item in this line, the major portion of which originates in New England, moving through New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, via rail and ocean, to Memphis, St. Louis, Fort Smith, Little Rock, etc., by way of Savannah, Ga., or Galveston, Tex.

Fort Smith is 300 miles farther west than is Memphis, the distance from Galveston to Fort Smith being less than to Memphis or St. Louis, yet the rate on cotton piece goods from New York and points taking same route to Fort Smith is 31 cents in excess of the rate applying to Memphis.

Take Hobart, Okla., which is 487 miles from Fort Smith and 720 miles from Memphis; the rate applying on cotton piece goods from Memphis to Hobart, is $1.03; from Fort Smith to Hobart, $1.34.

You will note that while Fort Smith is 233 nearer Hobart, Okla., than is Memphis, the rate applying on cotton piece goods from Fort Smith is 31 cents in excess of the rate applying from Memphis.

Sir, tell me that that is not a fair evidence of an unjust rate; tell me that it is not clear as the sunshine to the naked eye when all cloud and mist have been removed. The idea of charging 31 cents more to take a commodity from a given community to another community when it is 233 miles nearer than it is to the other shipping point is so unjust that it strikes me on its face that any man, I care not who or how biased he may be, ought to be able to say that it is discriminatory in an extreme degree.

Yet they come to us and indicate that they are doing nothing that prejudices any community, that prejudices any individual, and that their purpose is to do right under any and all circumstances. Sirs, none of you can hold to that belief if you will investigate the matter yourselves and see where these discriminations exist.

"From Memphis to Catoosa, Ind. T., 453 miles, the rate applying on cotton piece goods is 85 cents; the rate on the same commodity from Fort Smith for a distance of 453 miles is $1.23;" thus giving to the community of Memphis a discriminatory rate as against the community of Fort Smith.

In the district that I represent the railroads make glaring discriminations. They give a rate of 25 cents per barrel of flour from St. Louis to my home town, Helena, Ark., while they charge more than twice that much to a point in the district 125 miles nearer St. Louis. Such a discrimination is nothing short of robbery committed against the citizens of the nearer point. I want my home folks to do well on all occasions, but I do not want them to prosper if other people who are just as good must be robbed in order that they may do so.

Ah, gentlemen, these things speak for themselves; and it seems to me that under no circumstances could a man believe that the railroads are doing right when we find such discriminations as these.

But their arguments go further, and they endeavor to show that they are conducting themselves correctly now. I will read just a little of the evidence they are using to support their contentions. Mr. E. P. Bacon, who is the chief legislative agent of those who wish to confer rate-making authority upon the Commission, on December 9, 1904, while addressing the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives, was asked whether he had heard of any proceedings against the railroads in the matter of rebate, and he replied as follows:

I have not heard of any occasion for proceedings. It [meaning the Elkins law of February, 1903] has been so generally observed by the railroads since its passage that there has been no occasion for prosecution.

Now, the railroads knowing that we understand that Mr. E. P. Bacon is on the side of the President; on the side of all right-thinking individuals of this nation; on the side of the Democratic party as declared in three national platforms upon the subject of regulating rates; knowing that we know that his purpose is to give the Interstate Commerce Commission power to fix rates, I can not understand why they give us this little snatch of his testimony before that committee and withhold the other. We all know, in spite of what Mr. Bacon said to the committee, that these same railroads are being indicted to-day for giving rebates; indicted in Kansas City, Mo., in Philadelphia, and God only knows in how many other places they could be indicted if people would tell the truth and officers do their duty. I can not realize why they give this sort of testimony, unless it is for the purpose of confusing our minds and leading us who do not have everyday transactions with them to believe that they are doing the correct thing in the matter of fixing rates.

Railroad rates, like the Dingley tariff, are fixed too high is why rebates can be given and yet a profit be made on the freight transported. Let the railroads fix and publish a proper, reasonable, and just rate and the Interstate Commerce Commission will never make a rate, no matter how great their power to do so.

Railroads certainly would not give a rebate that would work a loss to them. Therefore the rebate rate must be just and remunerative to them, and they certainly ought not to complain if the Commission wishes to adopt a rate that they themselves have promulgated as a reasonable and just rate.

They also tell us that we ought to allow competition to regulate rates. Mr. Chairman, there is no known power of prophecy about me, but I possess some of the elements of guessing. Therefore I will not attempt to prophesy, but will venture the guess that railroad competition in this country is a thing of the past. Yes, sir; I believe it has taken the wings of the morning and flown to the uttermost parts of the sea.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one other subject that I desire to refer to, with no intention whatever of wounding the feelings of anyone in connection therewith, and that is in reference to a bill that was introduced at a former day of the session of this Congress by Mr. BENNET of New York, in which he seeks to reduce the representation of the State of Arkansas from seven to five Congressmen.

I represent a portion of the State of Arkansas, and I entered into a solemn compact with myself a great many years ago never to know of its being reflected upon by anyone without undertaking to explain the situation that brought about the reflection, or else to repudiate the reflection if it was false.

Sir, this bill seeks to reduce the representation of the State of Arkansas from seven to five. For what purpose? The bill goes on to indicate that it is because the legislature of the State has violated, in the enactment of our election laws, the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Sir, this matter has never been carried to the Supreme Court of the United States from our State for determination, but there is a provision in our election law that provides that a citizen, before he shall become a voter or have the privilege of the ballot, shall pay $1 for a poll tax. In other words, he must pay a poll tax before he can vote. The money received for the poll tax goes into the educational fund of the State, and the voter's children are educated, partially, with it. That is the only qualification that the Arkansas statute possesses that under any circumstances would be held to restrict the vote of any male human being after he has arrived at the age of 21 years, except where convicted of a crime of heinous character.

Now, sir, that is all that Arkansas has done. In what sense has she violated the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States? I understand that other Southern States have the same provision in their election laws and that the question has been before the Supreme Court of the United States from those States, and that it was held to be constitutional, and not in conflict with the provision of the amendment that I have just mentioned.

If the poll-tax provisions are not in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, how can Arkansas's provision be? I find, sir, in other States of the Union, that certain provisions are within the statutes of those States that seem to me would come nearer conflicting with this provision than ours, and yet no one has seen fit to introduce a bill to reduce their representation.

For instance, the State of New Hampshire requires the payment of all taxes assessed against a voter for a period of one year before voting and will not allow paupers to vote. There they not only have to pay a poll tax, but they have to pay all their taxes. We do not require that other taxes be paid. We do not prohibit the voter from voting because he is poor. A man may be ever so humble, be ever so poor, if he has a dollar with which to pay the poll tax he can walk up to the polls and vote like a king.

Massachusetts requires that the voter shall be able to read the constitution of the Commonwealth in the English language and to write his name, except where precluded from reading or writing by reason of physical defects, or he had the right to vote on the 1st day of May, 1857.

It strikes me, gentlemen, that there is a clear "grandfather" clause in the election law of that State, and a clause requiring a voter to be a scholar, and yet we hear of no one wanting to reduce its representation in Congress.

Connecticut requires a voter to be able to read a section of the constitution or a section of the statutes of the State before he can vote.

Pennsylvania requires all county or State taxes to be paid before her voters can vote, except when the voter is dead at the time he votes, while poor old Arkansas, as stated, simply requires the voter to pay a poll tax of $1, with which his children are to be educated, so that they will be qualified to vote when they see fit to change their domicile from Arkansas to Connecticut or Massachusetts. [Applause.]

I can not, to save myself, understand the heart or head of a Representative that could want the representation of Arkansas reduced, when she requires no more of a voter than that he pay the small sum of $1 to help educate his own children before he exercises the privilege of voting, and at the same time oppose the reduction of representation of Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Pennsylvania, that require so much more of their voters.

Oh, Mr. Chairman, I suppose the difference is to be found in the fact that Arkansas is in the South and Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Pennsylvania are in the North, and the gentleman who introduced the bill comes from the North.

If northern Representatives can afford to father such a partisan species of legislation, we of the grand State of Arkansas can stand it. We do not want to control the elections of any other State, but, by all of the powers that a just God has given us, we will control our own; and we will do it for the best interests of all of the people of the State.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am done with the unpleasant subject; but, sir, in closing, permit me to slightly paraphrase the effusions of the verse maker and say:

Let the howlers howl and the growlers growl,
Let the prowlers prowl and the gaudy gewgaws go it;
For behind the night there is plenty of light,
And the people of old Arkansas are all right—thank God—
And I know it.

[Applause.]

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, we have resolved ourselves into the most important committee of the House of Representatives. There has been referred to this committee the message of the Executive, one of the coordinate branches of the Government. We are now in the discussion of the reference of the message to the proper committees of this House. There has been discussion with reference to which committee the question of insurance should be referred. I have listened very carefully and with pleasure to many suggestions made by Members on both sides of the Chamber as to the reference of this matter. However, I am constrained to the belief that it would be far better for this House to create a new committee, to be known as the "Committee on Insurance," to which this matter could be more properly referred.

In the discussion of the question of insurance, some excellent gentlemen in this House have referred to the manner in which the insurance companies should be regulated. Some of them have referred to national supervision or examination, and that thought as expressed causes me to turn to a great branch of our domestic commerce, if you see fit to so call it, in which the Government is now engaged in supervising by virtue of examination. That great branch is the national banking system.

Last Monday the House and the country, aye, yes, other countries, were startled by the announcement that a great bank in the second city of the Union, in one of the great marts of trade of the world, had closed its doors by reason either of the conduct or misconduct of the officials in charge of that great bank. Associated with that bank and under its management were two other banks, under the control and management of the State of Illinois. Concurrently the great State of Illinois, through its auditor, sent an examiner there to look after the interests of the State of Illinois upon that question. Moving at the same moment and along the same line, the splendid Comptroller of the Currency of the United States sent a national officer there to examine the bank. Whether it happened by an act of coincidence, whether it was purposely prepared or not, I am not here to say, for I do not know; but the result of it was that the banks were found not to come up to the standard requirements of the laws of the State of Illinois and the Federal laws upon the statute books of our country. But to the credit of the great banks of the city of Chicago, that are patriotic, whose men desire to serve the commercial interests of that city and of the country, the associated banks of the city of Chicago came to the rescue of that bank, and as a result no depositor will lose a dollar of money by reason of the mismanagement of the officials of the institution that failed in that city. But that does not take from this House and from the country the fact that the national bank failed. Why? Was it due to the failure on the part of the National Government through its Comptroller, acting through his officers as bank examiners, that this bank was permitted to run along and accept the public funds? Was it the fault of the National Government that such conduct was disclosed in that bank? I am frank to say that it was not. I am frank to say that the Government through its officers did its full duty so far as it could under the conditions that existed at that time.

Now, what do we find? The national-bank act became a law of the land on February 25, 1863. From that date up to October 10, 1905, there have been 460 national-bank failures.

These failures incurred a loss to the individual depositors of those banks of $32,000,000. Now, this sounds large when we put it in the aggregate, but when you take into consideration the millions and billions of money that these banks have handled for depositors in the course of their business it is a small amount of loss as compared with the amount that they have handled justly and properly for the benefit of this great and growing country. The banks now in existence number 5,585. These banks under the law must be examined at least twice a year. We have given a force of 78 men to enable the Comptroller of the Currency to do this great work. There is a fault somewhere; perhaps we have not done our full duty and not given the Comptroller of the Currency a large enough force to do the work of examining these banks for the benefit of the depositors of the national banks.

Ah, my countrymen, the people have great faith in the Government; they have great faith in its officers. They have a right to believe that when a national bank examiner goes to a bank and reports that the conditions of that bank are stable, that proper examinations have been made, that our people may feel they can trust the examiner and his statement, and that they can safely put their money into the hands of that bank. Therein lies the mischief, if any there be, in not having a proper number of men to thoroughly examine and report in reference to the condition of the national banks in the United States. Now, as I have stated, the fault is not with the bank examiners, but with the bank officials to prevent trouble in this regard. I have the law before me, and I will read two sections that bear upon this question with reference to bank officials and the performance of their duty. Section 2500 of the Revised Statutes reads:

The total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including, in the liabilities of a company or firm, the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed one-tenth part of the amount of the capital stock of such association actually paid in.

Do you believe that if the law I have read had been properly enforced with reference to the management of that bank that one man connected with that bank could have borrowed the enormous amount of money that it is reported in the public press he borrowed out of the bank, of which he was an official?

Mr. GILLESPIE. If the gentleman will permit me. Does not the Comptroller of the Currency say that he himself has set aside that law because the penalty is too severe? I refer to the law forbidding national banks from lending more than 10 per cent of the capital stock to any one person. Is that his report you have there?

Mr. PRINCE. No, sir; it is the law.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Does the gentleman remember that the Comptroller of the Currency says that he has not undertaken to enforce that provision of the law because, in his mind, the penalty is too severe?

Mr. PRINCE. No, sir; I do not; but I do say this, that I do not believe it is given to me in my official life, when I have taken an oath to do my duty, that I can cheerfully set it aside because I do not like the law. A distinguished gentleman, one of the most distinguished men that this country ever produced in war or in peace, said: "The way to get rid of a bad law is to enforce its provisions." I would most cheerfully recommend that policy, that we should enforce this law, and if it be found hurtful upon the banks or the public and private funds of this country, let him come to this House through a proper communication and state the necessity for a modification, and then the fault, if fault there be, is upon us and not upon an official of this Government. There is no man who should set aside the solemn judgment of the House of Representatives upon a question of law.

Mr. GILLESPIE. That is correct.

Mr. PRINCE. Let me read further from section 5209:

Every president, director, cashier, teller, clerk, or agent of any association who embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, or credits of the association, or who, without authority from the directors, issues or puts in circulation any of the notes of the association; * * * and every person who with like intent aids or abets any officer, clerk, or agent in any violation of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be imprisoned not less than five years nor more than ten.

If the facts as reported in the public press of our country in reference to these failures in Chicago be true, it seems to me that this might be a proper matter for the Department of Justice to investigate and find out whether these sections have been violated by any officer connected with that or any other bank of the United States. I have no patience with a man who is not forced by stress of poverty or by circumstances, that holds a position as trustee of the people's moneys, to so far forget his duty that he does not take care of the trust funds placed in his hands to the fullest extent of the law, or, in the language of another distinguished gentleman, who represents the views of the minority about a public trust in this House, "that a public, or quasi public, trust ought not to be a private snap for anybody."

I take this opportunity to condemn the practice on the part of the Government of placing its funds in the hands of Wall street speculators whenever they seem to want more money to carry on their financial schemes. I congratulate Secretary Shaw that of late he has refused to place the people's money, at the request of high financiers, in the financial maelstrom of Wall street. I hope he will continue to refuse their requests for public money to be used by them for private gain.

I call the attention of the House and the country to this question, because it is pertinent to the issue that we have been discussing. It is along the line of Government control. It is along the line of exercising power by the Government. It is along the line of publicity. It is along the line of better service, and I am frank to say to you that I believe our Government officials are seeking to do their full duty. I believe that the Comptroller of the Currency is an honorable man, that he is seeking to do his full duty under the law as he sees it. If current reports in the newspapers are true, it may be that kindness of heart has led him to be a little more lenient than he ought to have been, but I am not prepared to say that had I been in his position I would have acted differently from what he did. We have no right to criticise him, and I do not, but the press says that he called attention to these loans, that he asked that they be reduced, that the promise was made that it would be done. It was not done, and later he acted wisely, justly, and lawfully, and did his full duty in this matter.

Now, when we come to discuss these other questions at the right time, we should bear in mind that when we ask a Government officer to examine a corporation of any kind, and that Government officer examines that corporation and puts upon it the great seal of the approval of the United States, he does an important act. He should do it guardedly, carefully, conscientiously, fully, freely, and fairly, and when the seal is so implanted by him, as one of the executive officers of the Government, the people have a right to put their trust in the acts he has done, and to believe in the corporation that he has approved. Therein lies the great responsibility which will fall on these executive officers, whether in examining insurance corporations or banking corporations, or in whatever capacity they may be engaged.

Returning to the question under discussion, I repeat that I am in favor of the Speaker of this House, through a proper resolution, appointing a committee on insurance that will have charge of the whole matter in all its various phases, and if under the Constitution of the United States we have any power, right, or authority that we can exercise, let all bills go to that committee, let them be considered, and bring in all the remedies that we can exercise, whether through interstate and foreign commerce, whether through the Committee on Ways and Means, or no matter what may be our right and authority to exercise a control over insurance. Let it go to one committee that shall have sole and exclusive control of the matter. Let that committee be composed of the best men in this House, irrespective of party. Let them study this great question, let them collect data, let them call to their aid the best minds there are in the House, and prepare a bill which will meet with the approval of the House and the country, and at the earliest moment let legislation be enacted in accordance with the recommendation of the Chief Executive of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Chairman, I saw an article in this morning's Washington Post that appealed rather strongly to me, and I thought I would like to make some comments upon the situation revealed by that article. I send it to the Clerk's desk to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PENROSE ON NEW RATE—WILL VOTE FOR BILL EMBODYING PRESIDENT'S VIEWS—HAS A TALK WITH CASSATT—PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY'S PRESIDENT ALSO CHATS WITH SENATOR KNOX AND ASSURES HIM HE IS IN SYMPATHY WITH ROOSEVELT'S IDEAS ON THE NECESSITY FOR READJUSTMENT OF RAILWAY AFFAIRS.

After a conference at the Senate Monday with A. J. Cassatt, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, Senator PENROSE announced that he would vote for the administration's rate-regulation bill.

Mr. PENROSE did not specify what he understood the Administration's bill to be or what he thought was favored in detail by Mr. Cassatt, but merely contented himself with the statement that he was now convinced that the principle of some form of railroad reform under the supervision of the Federal Government was correct and demanded.

Mr. Cassatt had a conference with Senator KNOX prior to seeing Senator PENROSE, and the railroad president assured Mr. KNOX that he was now of opinion that the position of President Roosevelt, as defined to him by Mr. KNOX, was agreeable to the interests and policies of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company.

NEVER OPPOSED PRESIDENT.

Mr. Cassatt has never been an outspoken opponent of President Roosevelt's railroad policy. On the contrary, he has been rather favorable to the main contention of the President, which, as popularly understood, is that there is a demand for remedial legislation affecting the present conditions in the railway management of the country, particularly in the matter of rebates.

While the Elkins law is generally supposed to have put an end to rebating, still it is the view of many of the supporters of the President's railroad policy that the evil still exists to a greater or less extent, and that this can be wholly stopped, or at least greatly minimized, by a law that will invest the Interstate Commerce Commission with the power to supervise the making of rates in general on complaint of shippers, with the right of appeal to the courts by the railroads attacked.

Whether or not Mr. Cassatt approves the maximum principle enunciated with great force and insistency by President Roosevelt in his Raleigh speech is not known, though in view of the fact that he declared he was willing to accept Senator KNOX's judgment as to the form of railroad legislation that should be enacted at this session is taken to mean that he is no longer averse to the investment of the Interstate Commerce Commission with the power to fix maximum rates in particular cases, with the understanding that the statute is distinctly to provide that each case is to stand on its own merits.

NOT A "CONVERT."

It is held by persons who say they know what Mr. Cassatt's attitude has been from the inception of the agitation of the railroad question that his announcement of a willingness to accept Senator KNOX's judgment in the matter is not to be taken as the "conversion" of the Pennsylvania Railroad's directing genius to the President's railroad policy, since they contend that Mr. Cassatt all along has been favorably inclined to the President's main contention. These same persons also hold that Senator PENROSE's announcement is exactly on a par with that of Mr. Cassatt, so far as the "conversion" feature is concerned.

Based upon the visit of President Cassatt and the resultant announcements as the attitude of himself and Senator PENROSE, considerable impetus has been given to the popular speculation as to the final outcome of railroad legislation in Congress this winter. As pointed out by The Post frequently since Congress assembled, it seems now reasonably certain that a regulation bill acceptable to President Roosevelt will be passed at this session.

But that measure will not contain all of the features of the original Esch-Townsend bill, which had the hearty indorsement of President Roosevelt, nor will it contain all the features of the bill prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission at the request of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce. It is well understood that Mr. Roosevelt views the latter measure more favorably at this time than the original Esch-Townsend bill, though it is equally as well understood that the President is averse to Congress considering any measure at this session in the same way as the Esch-Townsend bill was handled by the House at the last session, which was that it was the Administration's bill distinctly and irrevocably.

In a few words, it is known that the President does not desire to give his assent outright to any measure dealing with the railroad question which will be spoken of in Congress and by the public generally as the Roosevelt railroad bill.

In his annual message he was careful to impress upon Congress his belief that the lawmaking authority should handle this question with great care, and should see to it that a law is passed at this session affording relief from railroad exactions wherever it can be shown to a competent tribunal that exactions exist.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that article so clearly and forcibly reveals the condition of affairs that we find at the national capital, so far as legislation is concerned, that I thought it my duty, representing the people of my district, simply to stand up in my place and call attention to it. Now, what is it? A United States Senator being approached by the president of a great railroad system in this country, having a conference with him, after that conference says in effect: "Why, yes, all right; I am in favor of certain legislation pending before Congress, so I will yield."

Mr. Chairman, the President, at the last session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, sent a message here on the rate question, and we hailed him as a Democrat on that proposition; we tried to run over each other to do honor to the President of the United States and welcome him into the ranks of the Democratic party. The House passed a bill in that session which went to the other branch of this body, and there it died. The agitation, however, kept up. The President made his famous southern tour, and at Raleigh, N. C., he dropped a word that seemed to quiet all fears.

I want to call attention to that one word because I believe it explains this calm that has now succeeded to all that agitation; it is the word "maximum." The President in his message to Congress upon that subject, when he first referred to it, did not have the word "maximum" in it. Now, it seems that everybody is agreed. We are going to have a bill pass this House, it is going to pass the Senate, and the question will be settled.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in my humble view, if that bill passes the Congress of the United States and receives the signature of the President, and goes to the country as the law upon that question, the railroads will have gained all they want from this legislation and the people of the country will have gained nothing by the legislation. A maximum reasonable rate! If I have been able to understand any of the testimony that has been brought out upon that subject, if you apply that standard to any rate now established there is not one of them that could be overturned. If we are to take the highest rate back of which strong reason may be presented, I say if that is to be the standard, there is not a rate now in existence that could or ought to be changed.

Now, suppose we are investigating a rate. Here is testimony, plenty of it, supporting a 40-cent rate; there is testimony supporting a 50-cent rate; there is testimony supporting a 60-cent rate. Now, under the President's former message and the position he originally took on this question, what would be the duty of the railway commission sitting in judgment on that testimony? Why, they could average it up, and they could say that we will select the 50-cent rate. But, under the President's message now, what will that commission be required to do? Why, to fix the maximum, go as high as the evidence before them will justify, and they would be bound to fix the 60-cent rate. I do not believe there is a rate that can be touched if you apply that standard to it. I do not wonder that the President of a great railroad company comes and talks with his friend the Senator, and that the result of that conversation is a kind of agreement and understanding that the President is to have no opposition in getting this rate legislation through the Senate of the United States.

Why, gentlemen, we expected a different result than that on this question in the other branch of Congress. We knew that through the summer rumblings had come from the great railroad interests of the country that they were going to demand the support of the manufacturers of the nation. They said to the tariff baron, "Look here; you are protected." They said to the United States Steel trust, "Why, look at what you are taking from the people of the country, and now, if you do not give us your influence to defeat the President of the United States in his demand for the use of all the powers of Congress to protect the shipper we will use our influence against you upon your stand-pat demand." That is what the railroads want, to keep the rate-fixing power in their own hands. Why, they said to the steel trust, "You have got your hands in the pockets of the people; we have got as much right as you have, and you have got to assist us to fight the President of the United States and fight him off and overcome him." Well, what happens? The result is going to be that if this legislation passes, in my humble opinion, the United States Steel Corporation will continue its plundering of the people, the railroad will continue in possession of their rate fixing, and also plunder the people. I can not see any other end to this great calm that has all at once taken possession of the national capital, so far as the tariff barons and railroad magnates are concerned.

Another thing. You read the proceedings before the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Commission, and you will see the claims of the men who demand the ship subsidy. What is the basis of their demand? They say to the United States Steel Corporation, and they say it in unmistakable terms which no man reading these hearings can fail to see, that they plant themselves upon this proposition: "You have got your hands in the pockets of the people; you are collecting an enormous tariff rate; you have got to give up; you have got to come to our demand." If that suggestion is ever carried out, if the shipbuilding industry is purchased to support the Dingley tariff protection rates, they will stand there shoulder to shoulder with the steel trust fighting tariff revision. The railroads, through this legislation, if it succeeds, will be in the combine, and we see already that the national banks of the country are getting in their work greatly on the floor of this House. They are getting privileges and benefits through national legislation, and the result of it is that the combination between the tariff barons and the shipbuilders of the country, the railroads of the country, the national banks of the country, will be one grand combination against the American people, and you can not touch one without its calling on the other for support. That is the situation threatened in American politics to-day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I thought it was my duty not to remain further quiet, but to stand up and voice my protest not only in behalf of my people, but of the people of this country, against this unholy alliance—and I refer to the article that appears in the morning paper—in order that the people of this country may see just what the conditions are, because it presents it in such clear and strong light that I do not see how a human being of sense enough to read and write can fail to realize the real situation. It is against this that I wish to protest.

As to the particular matter before this House, I believe this question ought to go to the Judiciary Committee to settle the jurisdictional question involved in this legislation; but it seems to me, instead of discussing here the proposition of increasing the powers of the Federal Congress, we would be more profitably employed in discussing the proposition of the increase of the powers of the different States of the American Union. I believe it would be more profitable. The very reverse remedy appeals to my mind to that suggested by some Members on this floor. I believe in order to protect the people of this Union the power of Congress under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution ought by amendment to be curtailed rather than enlarged. What have we? We have these immense trusts and combinations rearing their heads in every part of this Union. There is not a State in the Union that does not see its danger, that does not realize the destructive and disastrous effects these combinations are having upon its own citizens, that does not realize that through this power these foreign corporations are coming into the State and robbing its own citizens, and the State is powerless because of this clause of the Constitution to protect its own citizens. It looks to me a good deal like the quarantine question referred to by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON]. The interests of the citizens as to the health and welfare of the citizens of the State come under the police power of the State. The Federal Government can not touch that; but in the case of these corporations the governor of every State, the legislature of every State, the supreme court of every State, can see and does see that these combinations are coming in and robbing the people, destroying competition, retarding the progress of the States and their development, and yet the State is powerless under this clause of the Constitution to protect itself. I say we would be more profitably employed if we were considering seriously the question of curtailing the power of the Federal Government under that clause of the Constitution rather than of enlarging its powers.

I do not believe in a palsied, in a paralytic democracy. I believe in the full exercise of the powers given to this Congress under the Constitution, and I believe that the country is looking for a democracy full of vitality, full of life and energy. Let us see to it that the people are not disappointed in this rate legislation. We ought to stand up for the rights of the people of the country, to stand as one man and defend the best we can the shippers of the nation. Let the legislation on this subject be definite, certain, and effective. The only relief to the shipper is in the plain, definite, and completely effective use of the rate-making power of Congress. Let us have no uncertainty on this point. The railroads will get all they ask out of this legislation on other questions. We ought to protect the people. That is the voice of democracy. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, it has not been my custom to take the time of the House simply for the purpose of delivering a speech when there can not be any useful purpose served thereby, and especially any immediate effect grow out of what might be said; but simply for the purpose of showing that I am not indifferent to this great question which is involved in this debate I have seen fit to take a short time for the purpose of having my views preserved in this RECORD. I appreciate the fact that this country is approaching a class of legislation with which the fathers had nothing to do and which undoubtedly is contrary to the constitutional views held by the early fathers with reference to the respective jurisdiction of the States and the General Government. It can not be otherwise, because in the early history of our country industries were provincial, and it was thought that the State power was peculiarly suited to deal with well-nigh every economical and certainly every business question, save alone that which pertained to the collection and disbursement of national revenues. The collection of taxation in that early day was not dreamed of being exercised for the purpose primarily of controlling the operations of certain lines of business and incidentally only for the purpose of revenue, save perhaps the policy of a protective tariff. But from the completion of the Pacific railways business began to take on new proportions.

The progress of American invention, of resulting larger production by reason of machinery and inventive genius, the spreading out of lines of transportation, and the specializing of manufacturing enterprises converted the business of this country, both commercial and manufacturing, into national enterprises. To-day one portion of the country, forced not by legislation but by the logic of events, devotes its energies to the peculiar business that that location qualifies it for, and recognizes the fact that according to wise laws of economics the people of that locality ought to content themselves with devoting their resources and energies toward that particular business to which that particular locality is suited. Then follows the necessary sequence of disposing of the great surplus. The first object of the manufacturing business was for the purpose of supplying the needs of the immediate community where it was located, but finally the great business began to be to meet that demand which could be economically reached and advantageously made and sold through the large lines of transportation. Hence industrial activity has been going through a process of nationalism, until to-day there is hardly a business that can be looked upon as provincial or local in its character.

The fathers would have undoubtedly sought to prevent the accomplishment of the very things which are thought necessary to-day through the medium of the national branch of the Government, and conservative men upon this floor to-day have not been able to entirely free themselves from the notion that we are perhaps tending too much toward relying upon the national political power for the purpose of solving every problem that confronts us and of curing every evil from which the people are supposed to suffer. But it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if any business can be looked upon as national in its character, from necessity, it is that of insurance. Its need is not confined to any particular class of business nor any particular class of individuals. It is recognized as a universal necessity, and there is probably not a man who has the smallest resources but who thinks that, among other things in which he is called upon as a matter of ordinary precaution to invest, insurance of necessity must be one of them. Hence the country, high and low, have taken a deep interest in the investigations which have been carried on in the State of New York through the authority of a committee appointed by the legislature of that State. The immediate object of that investigation was for the purpose of finding whether the funds of the companies had been properly safeguarded. The result of that investigation has shown, first, a most outrageous disregard of common rules of honesty and much more of violation of the ordinary rules of business decency. But, notwithstanding the startling disclosures which were made in connection particularly with the three properly safeguarded. The result of that investigation has there came with that information the equal assurance that with the peculations, large as they seemed and shameful as they were, there was really no danger to the security of the policy holders in any of the three companies that were examined.

Now, I took some interest in ascertaining the view point which a large number of policy holders in my home city took concerning that investigation. They were intelligent and they soon arrived at the conclusion that these peculations were comparatively so small that there would not be any considerable diminution of the capital of these great companies, and that instead of that it had indirectly the effect of advising the country that all those three companies were amply equipped with capital for the purpose of giving perfect assurance to the policy holders of those three companies that the companies would continue through all their existence to be able to meet fully every obligation. But the real interest which the policy holders took with reference to that investigation was naturally how it would affect their individual interests, and there were made some disclosures which bore upon the relations between them and the policy holders with reference to the methods of arriving at the conclusion as to the amount that would be due them under the terms of their policies outside of the question of the amount payable at death, which was fixed and certain. It was developed in that investigation that the amount of dividends which were due to the various policy holders was not arrived at by any mathematical calculation whatever. It was admitted by the actuary of one of those companies that the question of the amount of dividend which was to be paid to any policy holder at a period during the lifetime of the policy holder under the terms of many policies when a partial settlement is made under his election was determined by the actuary simply allowing a sum which in his judgment seemed adequate and at the same time the company could afford to pay under existing business conditions. But even that broad and uncontrolled exercise of judgment by the actuary in being willing to pay what he thought was fair did not seem to be satisfactory even from that standpoint, because the subsequent testimony of that same actuary developed the fact that with an increase of business of those large companies, coupled with an increase of profit of the companies, the dividends shrunk with the increase of volume of business and the increased amount of profits. In other words, that millions of policy holders all over the United States are holding policies with insurance companies which they themselves not only could not find out how much was legally due them under its terms, but upon which according to its terms it could not sue in a court of law with any assurance that they could recover any particular sum outside of the sum payable at death, which was fixed and certain. Business men, who under no circumstances would enter into any other form of contract in its terms so uncertain involving any sum approaching to the sum which they were willing to invest with these great companies in policies of life insurance, would take a policy of the great companies and put it in their safes with no assurance that they had any fixed or certain rights under that policy which would be recoverable in a suit at law, but dependent upon the benevolent spirit of the actuary when the day of settlement rolled around.

It seemed to me that even more important than the development of the reckless management of the funds of these companies were two disclosures. One of these was that the general management of those companies, with reference to their direct business of insurance, was only incidental to a larger and more important purpose to them. It developed that the large insurance companies were primarily and first above all institutions for the purpose of gathering the policy holder's money from all parts of the United States and from all classes of people for the purpose of massing it together for investment in speculative enterprises and promoting schemes. It seems to me that the cursory view I have been able to give to this subject is that if we are to have regulation of the life-insurance business through national control it ought to be a full and adequate power which we exercise; that the simple power through some of the different methods which have been proposed, to examine these companies and publish their liabilities and resources, will not meet the needs of the people of the United States. These insurance companies have entered into the domain of the legitimate business of savings banks. They have entered into business that ought only to be exercised through trust companies. They offer policies which hold out delusive hopes, entertained by men who are conservative in any other branch of business, that by some sort of magic an insurance company is going to produce at the end of a given number of years, and that, too, voluntarily and not compulsory, returns largely in excess of legitimate investments. This led the insurance companies wisely to divert the attention of the people who were patrons of life insurance from comparing legitimate life insurance from the standpoint of competitive rates. Each company has its peculiar and delusive scheme to present whereby we can, with a very small investment, secure to ourselves and our family a large and most satisfactory investment to care for them during the balance of their lives, accompanied not only by a fixed sum, but by that more dangerous hope that we are going to get a certain further undefinable return called "dividends."

What has been the result? The result has been that there has been practically no competition between the different companies concerning the rate to be paid upon life insurance because of this very fact. But I believe that if the nation is to exercise Federal control over life insurance, if we expect it to be effective and beneficial, we ought to have so full a power that we can regulate their methods of doing business as we do that of the national banks, so that we can compel life insurance companies to confine themselves to legitimate life insurance itself, and not be permitted to confuse the people with schemes connected with it which have no legitimate relation to straight life insurance, an insurance which is a necessity under present conditions. Now, then, there have been suggested during the course of this debate some four different propositions. There have been those who have thought that our only power under the Federal Constitution upon which we could base authority for this legislation was the taxing power in that document. There have been those, secondly, who have thought that we had no power under the Constitution except the power of inspection, if voluntarily accepted, in their own interest, by the insurance companies themselves. In other words, that the insurance companies would be glad to have the benefit of inspection under a law outlining a method; and with a bureau here authorized to undertake that inspection upon definite lines laid down, that it would be advantageous for that company to submit itself to that inspection and get the benefit of its results upon a good showing, and that when one large insurance company submitted itself voluntarily to a national inspection, others, its competitors, would be compelled to submit to the same authority. And the suggestion made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS] to provide that no insurance company be permitted to do business in the Territories if it did not submit itself to national inspection is practically upon the same lines as the one to which I have alluded. It is based upon the moral effect that such a readiness of the Government to inspect would offer to the companies. For myself I sincerely hope that it will develop that we have the power under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. The reason why I hope, notwithstanding some decisions which seem now to tend to the contrary, that power will be found to be properly given by that clause of the Constitution is because it will give us a fuller power to exercise complete control in the premises.

So far as the question immediately pending before this Committee of the Whole House is concerned, I believe I will vote for the original resolution and vote against the pending amendments, if it is the parliamentary situation that upon those amendments being voted down the vote will recur upon the original resolution before the House; and the reason I do that is because I do not want this House to be guided by self-interest of Members with reference to a particular committee in deciding the question as to what committee shall have charge of this legislation.

I desire to give the Speaker of this House power in the premises to refer that portion of the message of the President to the proper committee as he understands it under the rules of the House. If I had the power to send it to any committee which I prefer, I would say the Committee on the Judiciary. The reason why I prefer the Committee on the Judiciary is because it is natural that if this portion of the message is referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, for instance, and power given to that committee to consider the bills concerning the regulation of insurance, that they would be inclined to look at it from the standpoint of the peculiar jurisdiction which is vested in the Committee on Ways and Means; and if we should decide to send it to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, it is natural that the members of that committee, having had all through their experience, especially bills pertaining to this power given by the Constitution, they naturally would be prejudiced in looking for relief along the line of the peculiar jurisdiction of their committee. Because there is at the very inception of the discussion of this question a doubt as to whether we have any power, and if we have power, which clause of the Constitution gives it to us, I would prefer to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary, who in the initiative would commence an examination of this question at the proper place in the discussion, and that is to look out for the source of power from which they believe we can constitutionally have a remedy.

Mr. HASKINS. Mr. Chairman, the discussion which the resolution now pending before the committee has evoked seems to have taken a very wide range, but in the brief time I shall occupy I shall confine my remarks to the question of the proprosed Federal supervision of insurance. The question as to whether insurance, life, fire, or marine, can be brought within Federal control is not to be determined upon the amount of insurance that has been written in one State upon the application of citizens of another State; nor is it to be determined upon the basis of the honesty or the dishonesty of the officers and agents of the companies soliciting and engaged in the business of insurance, but for the reason, and that only, that the Constitution of the United States has conferred upon Congress the power to regulate and control the business of insurance. No one claims that Federal control can be exercised over insurance companies that do business only within the State where located under the terms of their charter; the action must be justified, if at all, upon the ground that they do business in other States and, therefore, by reason of its interstate character it comes within the provision of the Constitution with reference to interstate commerce. As yet no one on the floor of this House has advanced a convincing argument nor cited any authority to demonstrate such proposition to be true, nor has the President done that in his message. He simply advises action in that direction, subject always, of course, to constitutional limitations.

I do not think I misrepresent the position of laymen in general when I say that they are very apt to construe the Constitution and the law to be such as they severally would like to have it, while the lawyer, whether sitting as a court or as a legislator, is, or at least should be, governed in his construction by the evident intention of the framers of the Constitution, well-established precedents, and the decisions of the courts.

Insurance rests in contract between the parties thereto. The life-insurance company, upon the application of the assured and the performance of certain conditions on his or her part, promises to pay upon the happening of an event a certain sum of money to the assured or to the beneficiaries named in the policy or contract.

The fire and marine insurance companies, in case of loss by fire or water or other casualties, agree to pay a sum of money to the assured, etc.; and although the parties to the contract may reside in different States, involving a sort of commercial intercourse between two or more States in the regular transaction of their business, it is a bold lawyer who will contend that these contracts of insurance are merchandise or commodities of transportation that come within the provision of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution.

If it be true that such transactions constitute interstate commerce which Congress may regulate, what may not Congress do in this direction? The savings banks of the country, and especially those of that section from which I come, hold in trust millions of money, the property to a very large extent of laboring men and women and of widows and orphan children. Millions upon millions of this money has been and constantly is being invested in real estate mortgage securities in many of the other States by the officers of these institutions. These loans, like transactions of insurance, constitute contracts between parties residing in different States, and involve transportation between the States by means of the United States mail in the transmission of letters, mortgages, trust deeds, money, and checks. If the Federal Government under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution has the right to extend its paternal hand for the protection of the individual in the matter of insurance, it certainly has the same right in the matter of the savings banks. The transactions of both alike rest in contract and only in contract, and does not constitute that kind of commercial intercourse that does the sale of merchandise in one State which to complete the transaction requires to be transported into another State. Policies of insurance, like the promissory note and mortgage, are not articles of merchandise, but simply the written evidence of a promise to do something.

Great corporations manufacture commodities for sale and delivery into other States as well as in the State of their creation, and yet the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the affairs of the corporation can not be regulated by Congressional enactment, but that it is the manufactured article only which Congress can interfere with when it commences its journey across State lines. The Supreme Court has solemnly adjudicated in several well-considered cases, cited by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, that the writing of policies or contracts of insurance and the delivery of them to parties in another State was not interstate commerce.

The Commissioner of Corporations, in his report, just published, says:

> In view of the decisions of the Supreme Court I have not felt warranted in trying to assume jurisdiction over insurance companies for the purpose of investigation. The fact that State supervision has failed to prevent great abuses in the management of some companies does not of itself justify Federal action. It must be shown, first, that insurance is subject to Federal regulation under the commerce clause of the Constitution; second, that Federal supervision would be of such a character as to correct existing abuses and prevent future ones, and, third, that such supervision would result not only in greater security to policy holders, but would relieve them, through their companies, of the great and unnecessary expense of duplicate inspections and investigations by different States. Seemingly the most effective way to settle the question is for Congress to so legislate upon the subject as to afford an opportunity to present to the Supreme Court the question whether insurance as now conducted is interstate commerce, and hence subject to Federal regulation.

This is the hope and prayer of those who would invoke Federal interference with many of the common transactions of life, including insurance, that if Congress will obey public clamor gone wild and enact a measure declaring insurance corporations subject to Federal control the Supreme Court may reverse itself and declare the enactment constitutional.

While the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, like the judges of the several State courts, are human, still the members of that greatest of all earthly tribunals never have, and may this Capitol crumble into dust whenever they do, adjudge any law of Congress constitutional, not in response to their own high conception of duty and understanding of the law and Constitution, but at the demand of great popular clamor. They were not moved by any such base influences, which may be termed by some the vox populi, when they decided the income-tax law enacted by Congress to be unconstitutional, and may the day be far distant when, by Congressional enactment or judicial decision, the authority of the States over their own corporations shall be entirely destroyed.

I am a policy holder in both the New York Life and the Mutual Life of New York, and I feel that my holdings are more valuable by reason of the investigation of the Armstrong legislative committee. If evils have existed or do exist in the manner in which these companies have conducted their business, and no one doubts it, those existing evils can be remedied much more promptly and effectively under State than under Federal supervision.

The righteous indignation, an outraged public sentiment sure to exist among the people of the State that created the corporation, and will certainly be made manifest upon the disclosure of the least evidence of evil doing, will demand in no uncertain sound that its officers and legislators shall correct the wrong, and the demand will become effective long before the National Government, its officers and agents, have awakened from a sound and dreamy sleep. I represent, in part, a little State way up among the green hills, having a population according to the last census of a little over 343,000 souls. It has 42 savings banks, carrying the deposits of over 140,000 men, women, and children, amounting to over $47,000,000, with an undivided surplus of over $3,000,000. It has 49 national banks with a paid-up capital of $6,185,000. The former, notwithstanding they are constantly loaning money in other States, are under the exclusive jurisdiction and supervision of the State, where they should always remain. Each of these banks are thoroughly examined by the State inspector of finance twice a year and his report made public annually, and again biennially. Bankruptcy or voluntary liquidation is a thing unknown among them, by reason of the conservative, careful, and honest management of their officers. The 49 national banks are, of course, under exclusive Federal control, and while no present unsoundness is known to exist, yet within the last twenty-five years I have known of at least 5 that have been obliged to close their doors by reason of their insolvency, and the insolvency of at least 2 of them had been of long standing, notwithstanding the inspections of the national-bank examiner.

We have another institution in our State of which every Vermonter is proud. It is the National Life Insurance Company, at Montpelier, chartered by the State over fifty years ago, organized and for years managed by Dr. Julian Dewey, the father of our present great Admiral. It has well-invested and secured assets, in round numbers, of $32,000,000; its insurance in force amounts to over $135,000,000; its annual cash income meets its yearly liabilities, leaving an annual "saved income," according to its last year's report, of nearly $3,000,000. Its present president was for many years the actuary of the company, and no man has a better understanding of life insurance than he. He is paid a salary of $15,000 per year, and its other officers a reasonable but in no sense an exorbitant compensation. The affairs of the company are conservatively and carefully managed in the interests of its policy holders, and they require no Federal supervision.

Vermont's secretary of state and State treasurer are its insurance commissioners, who examine and report upon the condition of the company, as they do of its fire insurance companies. The State supervision which these corporations have, to my mind, is far superior to any supervision that could be given them, were it constitutionally permissible to place them under Federal control. Believing as I do that Congress has no constitutional authority to legislate upon the subject of insurance, but that it belongs to the States exclusively to create, supervise, and control, I shall vote, if the opportunity offers, to commit that portion of the President's message to the Committee on the Judiciary. [Loud applause.]

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 480. An act supplemental to an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, and making appropriation for isthmian canal construction, and for other purposes.

DISTRIBUTION OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have read first the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is a matter of general knowledge, published in almost all the reputable daily newspapers of the United States, that Midshipman Jerome Pettus Kimbrough, of the fourth class of the United States Naval Academy, at Annapolis, Md., was viciously hazed and brutally treated in said hazing by being compelled to stand on his head until he became unconscious; and

Whereas Midshipman Warren Abbe Van De Veer, according to said accounts, while on duty at said academy observed said occurrence and failed to report the same; and

Whereas it is a fact, ascertained by recent court-martial sitting at Annapolis, that Midshipman James R. Branch, jr., a midshipman at said academy, recently met his death in a fist fight with Midshipman Minor Meriwether, also a midshipman at said academy; and

Whereas it appeared to be fairly well ascertained from the testimony before said court-martial that the practice of fagging, hazing, and fighting were common at said institution, and that the same was winked at and connived at by the officers of said institution, whose duty it is to maintain discipline among the midshipmen attending there and to train and perfect them for service as officers in the Navy of the United States, and to protect said midshipmen during their attendance at said institution in their health and life, and that the fault in these cases and the failure to maintain such discipline as would render such occurrences impossible lays more at the door of the officers of said institution than upon the shoulders of the midshipmen attending there: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, requested and directed to report all information in his possession concerning the said hazing of the said Jerome Pettus Kimbrough and the fight between Midshipman Branch and Midshipman Meriwether and the result of any investigation that he may have made to the House of Representatives, together with such recommendations as he may care to make by which the conduct and management of the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis may be so changed and reconstructed that conditions thereat may be created under which such occurrences as are hereinbefore referred to may be impossible.

Resolved, That a special committee of five Members of the House of Representatives be appointed by the Speaker to have full power to send for persons and papers, and, if necessary, to proceed to the Naval Academy at Annapolis and elsewhere to thoroughly investigate the foregoing subject, and especially to inquire and ascertain what officials of said institution, if any, are responsible for a laxity of discipline which permits such disgraceful and disastrous occurrences, and to report to the House of Representatives within thirty days the result of such investigation, with such recommendation as may seem to said committee to be advisable to establish a condition of discipline among both the officers in charge of said institution and the midshipmen attending thereat as will certainly and forever prevent a possible repetition of such events; and to especially recommend such action as may lay the blame in such cases where it belongs, so that in such cases hereafter the result may not end with the mere dismissal of promising young men from the institution, but may bring to book and visit proper penalties upon the trained officers in charge of such institution for the conduct of which they must be held responsible.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I have had this resolution, which was introduced by Mr. PEARRE, of Maryland, on December 16, read from the Clerk's desk, in order that it might be directly brought to the attention of the Members on the floor of this House. It presents a question for our consideration which, in my judgment, should appeal to each man here present. It not only reaches every Congressional district throughout the United States of America, because I take it that there are few, if any, Representatives here who have not at this time an appointee in the Naval Academy at Annapolis, in whom they feel a personal interest, but it reaches the sacred confines of some home in every district and touches the heart of the mother in that home, who is daily looking with loving tenderness and patriotic pride at the career of her boy—a student in the Naval Academy at Annapolis.

That it appears throughout the public press of this country, as is recited in this resolution, that there is hazing existing at the academy is beyond a doubt. Not only is it asserted in the newspapers, but there is no question that it is absolutely true that it does exist at this academy, and exists in a very marked degree. That there should be placed some check upon it, in order that the scenes which have recently been enacted there may not again transpire, is important not only to us as representatives of the people, but is important to the young men who are students in this academy. This resolution proposes, in my judgment, a remedy which will be effectual to bring about, in case it is adopted, that result, and therefore I sincerely hope it will be adopted by this House.

It provides, in the first place, after the recitation of the facts, that we call upon the Secretary of the Navy to give to us whatever information he may have in his possession in reference to any hazing which has taken place, and then goes further and provides for the appointment by the Speaker of a select committee of five who shall have authority to sit at the Capitol, or the Naval Academy if they prefer, and send for persons and papers and make a thorough, full, and complete investigation of the conditions which are now existing there.

Officers and students are seeking for some excuse for the recent deplorable occurrences at this academy. They want some reason to justify these terrible conditions which have been brought about by a code which is the unwritten law, they say, of this institution. In their great desire to find some reason for it that would justify them, they are pointing to the fact that Congress authorized the reinstatement in the Navy of three midshipmen during the last session of this House, and that this was done in response to a special message which was sent by the President of the United States to this body recommending that such action be taken. It is true that Congress did, by law, authorize three young men to be reinstated in the Navy who had been expelled from the Naval Academy, and that the President, to this House in a message, did recommend that it be done. We all know that in every State in the Union the governor has the right, when he believes that circumstances and conditions justify him, to extend a pardon to a man whom he feels ought not to have visited upon him the severe penalty prescribed by law for the offense of which he has been convicted. Under the circumstances under which these young men were expelled from this academy the President of the United States and a majority of the Members of Congress believed that they should have clemency extended to them and be reinstated. I am frank to say to you that I did not agree with them, and therefore for that reason I did not vote for that bill, but, on the contrary, I voted against it in the Fifty-seventh Congress when it was placed upon its passage, and I also again voted against it at the last session of this House. If it were to do over I would vote against it again, because I believed good discipline was necessary at the academy and that it could only be obtained by rigid and just enforcement. The majority of the House differed from me and agreed with the President of the United States and with the recommendation of the Naval Committee on this question, which was unanimous, and passed the law authorizing their readmission into the Navy. But I desire to say that in my judgment there is in that fact no justification or valid excuse for the conditions that exist in the academy to-day; and why? For the reason that hazing existed there prior to the time that these young men were readmitted; it has existed since that time, and the conditions now are not different from what they were prior to the time that the President of the United States sent that message to Congress, and they are not different from what they were prior to the time that Congress enacted the law that authorized the readmission of these young men into the Navy. Therefore it can not be given as a valid reason for hazing there now and is no answer to the charge.

If hazing in the academy had been unknown up to the time this action was taken by the President and Congress, possibly then there would be some justification for saying that the action of Congress contributed to bring about the present conditions, but with hazing there before the above action was taken and with hazing there since it can not be maintained that Congress is responsible for it.

The granting of a pardon to somebody who has violated the law is no justification and no excuse for the commission of another or similar crime by somebody else. Therefore, so far as that question is concerned, it is absolutely without foundation or reason to say that we, the Congress of the United States, are responsible for the conditions which now exist there and which are so greatly deplored not only by the Members of this House, but by the people of the United States.

The fact that recently one young man met his death in an encounter brought about under the unwritten code that governs the students in that institution, and the further fact that this young man referred to in this resolution, Jerdone Pettus Kimbrough, was recently made to stand upon his head until he fainted and had to be carried to the hospital in order that he might be resuscitated, has startled the people of this country, and they are demanding that through their Represenatives some remedy be devised that will forever put an end to existing conditions. [Applause.] It is necessary that prompt action be taken that the sons of our constituents who are there may be protected and have the same rights extended to them upon admission to that institution that are extended to the young men already there, regardless of the length of time they have been there. I want to say to you that because one young man occupies a lower class in that school than another makes no difference, and it does not make the higher-class man any better than the lowest-class man. [Applause.]

I know that the splendid young man I had the honor to send there only a short time ago, and who is a lower-class man, is just as good and deserves to receive the same courtesies and consideration as are extended to any man in any other class. He is named for the first Admiral of the Navy, John Paul Jones, for whose body we sent to foreign shores and brought it back to our country by an escort sent especially from our Navy for that purpose, and whose remains now rest upon the school grounds at Annapolis.

My appointee is Paul Jones Peyton, and I believe, in course of time, if given the same opportunities, he has the manly traits in him to rise to the same rank and fill it in the same dignified manner that the original John Paul Jones did.

Mr. WACHTER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. CANDLER. I am always ready to yield to my good friend from Maryland.

Mr. WACHTER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question. There are gentlemen upon the floor of this House who meet other gentlemen upon the floor of this House who oppose hazing by telling them that a boy who has not been hazed will be brought up a mush-and-milk admiral. I want to ask the gentleman in perfect good faith whether he thinks that hazing makes a cadet any more brave than he otherwise would be, in reply to those gentlemen who think that men who are not given hazing are mush-and-milk men? [Applause.]

Mr. CANDLER. I certainly do not think so.

Mr. WACHTER. Neither do I.

Mr. CANDLER. I do not believe that any kind of brutality, no matter what it may be, contributes to develop manhood along right lines. [Applause.]

Mr. WACHTER. I am with you.

Mr. CANDLER. On the contrary, I believe that those things which do contribute to build up and properly develop American manhood and manhood throughout the world are those ennobling traits of character—kindness, forbearance, love, esteem, and respect for the rights of others. They appeal to the finer feelings of our natures and generate confidence in our fellowmen, and create within us laudable ambition for higher, nobler, and better things. What we oftentimes yearn for is encouragement, a tender word, a glad hand, a bright face, and a genial heart to bid us godspeed in an effort to press onward and upward and reach a sphere among our fellow-men where we may stand for the glory of the country and for the honor of our God, who loves and takes care of us all. [Applause.]

Mr. RIXEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. CANDLER. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I agree fully with what the gentleman has said upon this subject. I think that the resolution which the gentleman was reading was introduced by Mr. PEARRE.

Mr. CANDLER. I wanted to give him credit for it, and think I did.

Mr. RIXEY. There is another resolution, which I think was introduced by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD].

Mr. CANDLER. I have read that resolution.

Mr. RIXEY. Both resolutions were referred by the Speaker to the Committee on Rules, of which he is chairman. They have both been there for some days, and they are not reported out of that committee. I think we can reasonably assume that it is not the intention of the Committee on Rules to report any of those resolutions. I want to ask the gentleman as to what he proposes, and how he expects to get this investigation by this House unless that committee will consent to make its report.

Mr. CANDLER. Of course, Mr. Chairman, it is impossible to pass any bill or resolution in this House under the rules as they exist to-day unless you can get a resolution reported back from the committee to which it is referred, or unless you can get the recognition of the Speaker and secure the unanimous consent of the House. I doubt very seriously the effectiveness of our persuasive powers to get a report from the committee on this resolution or to get the Speaker to recognize its author to call it up for passage, but notwithstanding all that, the country is interested in this question, and it may do good for the country to know that there has been such a resolution proposed upon the floor of this House, and if passed would bring about the appointment of a select committee to make a thorough and full investigation of conditions existing in the Naval Academy, and that somebody is or will be responsible if some such resolution is not passed by this House, because this school belongs to the people and is conducted by their paid employees, and I believe they want to know all the bed-rock bottom facts in reference to this whole situation. The time is coming and will speedily arrive in my judgment when the boys of this country, not on account of any personal fear, but because they don't want to be forced to kill somebody even for self-protection, will hesitate—yea, even decline—to go to this institution and engage in the service of their country because of existing conditions there. It may be that some manly boy would be perfectly willing to go there in order to stand off some of the hazers and teach them a lesson if they undertook to haze him. Such a thing was done at one time at the Military Academy at West Point. There was a brave, a courageous, a noble young man there who did not propose to be humiliated, who did not propose to be made a menial of by people simply because they arrogated to themselves that they were better than somebody else, and that therefore they had the right to haze somebody because of that fact, and this young man promptly informed them that if they ever attempted to haze him they might take the result, and they did attempt to haze him and they took the result, and the result was the death of one of the men who attempted hazing upon him.

Now, then, it may be possible that there may be others that would pursue the same course, but I dare say there is no man upon this floor, that there is no citizen of the United States of America, that wants to see any such condition as that exist. They do not want their boys, the young men of this country, put in an attitude where they will feel that the necessity of the occasion demands for their own self-respect and for their own protection that they shall resort to any such means. But if this continues that result will follow, because I dare assert upon this floor now that there are plenty of boys in the United States of America to-day that if sent to the Naval Academy at Annapolis, rather than be humiliated and degraded, would resort to the means I have just referred to and protect themselves, even to the taking of life. Let us save the boys in the future from such a possibility.

Now, I am frank to say that I do not censure boys who are there, under existing conditions, so much for engaging in encounters like the Meriwether-Branch affair, for they fought in the open upon equal terms to settle their differences, and the unwritten code required them to fight or suffer disgrace and ostracism. It was a lamentable affair, and we should take prompt action to prevent its recurrence. But for the hazing of Kimbrough there is no excuse or justification—none on the face of the earth. This resolution recites his name "Jerome Pettus Kimbrough." His name is Jerdone Pettus Kimbrough. When I was younger than I am now, I went to school to the grandfather of this young man and with his uncle. His uncle, Dr. Jerdone Pettus, for whom he was named, was my classmate. He is to-day in the Marine-Hospital Service.

When John C. Pettus, my old preceptor and the grandfather of this young man Kimbrough, brought him to the city of Washington on his way from the old Volunteer State of Tennessee to enter him at the academy, he brought him to the hotel where I board and introduced him to me. I looked into his bright and manly face. His heart was aglow because he believed he was going to enter an institution where he would have an opportunity to seek honor among his fellows, and that at some future time he might have occasion to defend the flag of his country. He was a noble and splendid specimen of young American manhood. He was not afraid to risk the bullets; but it seems he suffered at the hands of the "bullies," simply because he was physically unable to contend with the numbers by which he was surrounded, and was compelled to submit to the indignities that were visited upon him or suffer worse. When I contemplate the scene and remember the gray head of that noble old grandfather, whose hope and ambition centered in the boy, I am filled with indignation. Hon. M. R. PATTERSON, of the Tenth district of Tennessee, appointed Kimbrough to the Academy, and here is how he feels about it. I clip this from the Commercial-Appeal, of Memphis, Tenn.:

"BRUTAL," SAYS PATTERSON.

LEBANON, TENN., December 16, 1905.

I have just learned of the hazing of Kimbrough. This offense is much worse than the Meriwether affair. Meriwether fought openly, and it was an equal contest. Kimbrough was taken advantage of, and his treatment was both brutal and cowardly. I hope Kimbrough's friends and relatives will not ask to withdraw him from the academy. Those who took advantage of him should be punished and Kimbrough should remain.

M. R. PATTERSON.

As I said a moment ago, I do not censure the boys so much who are there now for having engaged in such an encounter as Meriwether and Branch engaged in, because of the fact that there is the unwritten code, so I understand, in that academy, that requires under certain conditions and certain circumstances that the young men shall meet upon this so-called "field of honor," and shall settle their differences in the brutal manner in which the differences were sought to be settled between those two young men, and which cost one of them his life and cast a blight over the life of the other one, from which he will not escape through all the coming years of his existence. Nobody could have read his testimony before the court-martial whose heart would not go out to him with sympathy when he said, in substance, that he believed Branch was better off than he was, sleeping where he was asleep, than to be left like him with a blight upon him, with a shadow over him, with the darkness surrounding him, from which he would never escape.

I say that I do not censure them so much, for the reason that they must, as the matter now stands, engage in these practices under "the code" or be isolated and ostracised in disgrace and stamped as cowards, and no man of manhood or spirit will wear that stigma. Therefore, because of the existence of this unwritten code, they are compelled to fight. The difficulty, my friends, consists not in the young men there. There is as noble a class of young men there, I have no doubt, as there is in this country, because I do not presume that any Member of Congress would knowingly send a young man there whom he did not believe was possessed of high principles and noble aspirations. Therefore, I take it to be true that the young men there come up to the standard of any similar number in any institution anywhere.

The trouble is in this system, in this "code." The trouble is in an unwritten law of some kind that exists there to-day, and which they say has existed there for a long time. What we want to do is to dig that up root and branch, and relieve the students of its baneful influences and deplorable requirements, and put all the young men there upon a common plane of American manhood, and let every one of them stand as an American, equal in rights, privileges, and opportunities with any other man, no matter to what class in school he belongs. [Loud applause.] That is what we need to-day. So long as this "code" exists, so long as these environments continue, these scenes of brutality will be reenacted. Men may overcome their surroundings, and often do, but we must not place these young men where they will be humiliated and their spirit to some extent crushed.

I understand that a lower-class man, when he goes to the table, is not even permitted to look at or speak to an upper-class man; he must sit and look in his plate and bow his head in the presence of his superior, and thus recognize the grandeur of him whose head is crowned with the honor of being an upper-class man.

Not only that; I am informed, also, that a lower-class man is not permitted to visit in the same circle of society that an upper-class man moves in. He is not permitted to visit the same young ladies where an upper-class man sees proper to go; and if the upper-class man finds the lower-class man there the lower-class man must at once retire, and he is not even permitted to speak to him there, offer a suggestion, or even make an apology to the young lady in his presence for his departure; but without ceremony and without standing upon the manner of his going he must depart at once from the presence of this overshadowing grandeur and conglomerated greatness. I will tell you what I believe. I believe that there is nothing better in all the world than patriotic, brave, and chivalrous American manhood except the loveliness, the purity, and the beauty of American womanhood. [Loud applause.] Some one has said that when God made the American girl, "He sent His angel messengers throughout all the star-strewn realms of space to gather all there was of beauty and brightness, of enchantment, of glamour. When those angels returned from their harvesting of beauty and threw down their glittering burden at His feet, He began in their wondering presence the fashioning of the American girl. He wrought with the gold and the gleam of the stars, shifting glories of the rainbow hues, and the pallid silver of the moon. He wrought with the crimson which swooned in the rose's rubied heart, with the pure sweet snow which gleams from the lily's petals, and the fires and the flames which flash and leap from jewels' depth. Then glancing deep into His own bosom, He took of the love which gleamed there like some rare pearl beneath the wind-kissed waves of a summer sea, thrilled into the form He was fashioning, and all heaven and earth rejoiced, for, lo! He had wrought the American girl." [Continued applause.]

Such girls should have the right to make their own selection and choose their own associates, under the interested and loving advice of mother, without any dictation of extraneous influences of self-assumed censors of society. I am informed, however, that to such an extreme has this rude and unwarranted dictation of these upper-class men gone that they not only visit a penalty upon the lower-class men but upon the young lady herself by ostracizing her from society whenever she permits a lower-class man to visit her when she has an opportunity to receive the attentions of an upper-class man. Such a snobbish conception of the rights of others is un-American and deserves the condemnation of every patriotic lover of this Republic.

I have never been blest by having a son in my home, but I thank God that He has given me three bright-faced, blue-eyed, rosy-cheeked girls, who are the pride and sunshine of my life. Should they in the future go out from my home to one of their own I shall be happy indeed if their lives are committed to the care and protection of a plain American citizen who has an honest hand, a pure heart, and a clean life—a man of integrity and character, devoted to his country and to his God. To be the queen in such a home is woman's God-given and highest sphere.

I had rather see my daughters associate with a young man who is possessed of those priceless virtues, though he may not have a dollar in the world, than to see them shine in so-called "high society," with somebody who can boast nothing except some exalted position or inherited wealth cast upon them, without merit or worth on their part, by favored circumstances surrounding them.

In other words, what I admire is true worth in the man himself. I do not care what his position is so far as classes are concerned or where his field of activity may be in this life. It is not position or wealth or honors in the world that constitute a man in the truest and highest sense, but it is nobility of character, purity of aspirations, cleanliness of life, devotion to country, and obedience to God. A man in whose heart throbs those sublime conceptions is a patriot, and no matter what his trade, calling, or vocation in life may be he is one of nature's noblemen and entitled to the highest respect, confidence, and esteem of his fellows.

Princes and lords are but the breath of kings,
An honest man's the noblest work of God.

[Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. CANDLER. With pleasure.

Mr. SIMS. I should like to ask you if you do not think such a young man as you have described, who has educated himself, is far above, in meritorious consideration, any young gentleman who is sent there at the expense of the Government to learn how to abuse and brutalize the lower-class men you refer to?

Mr. CANDLER. I do not think it makes so much difference as to whether a man educates himself, although that is always to his credit. Any man who has the manhood, grit, and determination to press forward in life and overcome difficulties and accomplish something for himself and "work out his own salvation," as we sometimes say, is entitled to very great credit; but I have seen splendid young men educated in our free schools who were an honor to themselves, their families, and their country. I would not draw the line there. What I am emphasizing is that we should look to the man himself, and the inherent merit that is in him, and not to the veneering on the outside. In other words, as I understand it, there is but one overshadowing general rule in this world. God Almighty made that rule, and that is a rule of righteousness. That is where He placed the standard. It was written by the divine finger of inspiration upon the pages of the "Blessed Book" that shed forth their luminous light and grow brighter and brighter the more we read them, the more we study and meditate upon them. That is the standard that is there fixed for men and for women. Some people act like they believed there was one standard for a man and another for a woman, but there is not. "The Book" requires no more of my wife than it does of me, no more of my mother than it requires of my father; it is the same rule of righteousness for all. Therefore, I do not care what a man's surroundings may have been, if he rises as near to the perfection of that divine standard which has been fixed by the great Teacher of all the world as his human foibles and weaknesses will permit, then he is as good as anybody else who does not acquire greater perfection. If I do right and you do right, I am as good as you are and you are as good as I am. If you do right and I do not do right, you are that much better than I, because at last it must be a test of true merit, of righteous living, and of correct principle. American manhood has always stood for the recognition of the standard of right and demanded that it be higher than in any other country in the world.

I want to see the time come when the American woman will recognize the fact that the American man is the best in all the world, and then there will be no American woman waiting for some one to cross the ocean with a title to woo her hand and heart. I want them to recognize that "American manhood" in its true sense is the highest title that any man can possess in all the world, and that he that reaches the standard of true and genuine American manhood has reached the loftiest pinnacle that any man can reach in all the universe of God. To be the uncrowned queen of an uncrowned king in an ideal American home is the consummation of human happiness, in comparison with which the titles offered "for sale to the highest bidder" by the empty heads and the heartless lives of the worthless adventurers who visit our shores with matrimonial intentions dwindle into contempt and oblivion. God save our American girls from such a fate. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SIMS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. CANDLER. Always glad to do so.

Mr. SIMS. I want to state to the gentleman that not long since I was talking with a gentleman in my own county about appointing his son to the Naval Academy. He thanked me, but said he had rather his son would do without these advantages which I had explained to him than to go there and have to suffer the humiliations he would have to suffer by being hazed, as he understood all were hazed without exception, and declined the appointment on that account.

Mr. CANDLER. I remarked only a few moments ago that I thought that would be the result if these conditions were permitted by the Representatives of the American people to continue in this academy.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. CANDLER. Always glad to have a suggestion from my splendid friend from Kentucky.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I concur in a great deal of what the gentleman from Mississippi has said; he has said it eloquently and well, but the phase of the matter that I would like to hear discussed is, how are we to prevent these cruel practices that have been obtaining in these institutions so long? There seems to be no doubt but that it is a practice that has been observed in the institutions ever since their creation almost. There ought to be some way by which it can be overcome. If we have to have a separate place for the first classmen, we had better have it than to have these disgraceful occurrences. I would like to have the gentleman from Mississippi, and others who have thought upon this subject a great deal more than I have, to give some expression to the House of what they think is the proper remedy.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky is very pertinent. The resolution which I am now discussing, if adopted, would secure the appointment of a special committee by the Speaker of this House, to consist of five members, to make a thorough, full, and complete investigation into the conditions existing at the Naval Academy in reference to hazing, and report back to this House an adequate and efficient and complete remedy to prevent it in the future. My judgment is that if we would pass a statute providing for the prompt expulsion of every cadet who is found guilty of hazing, and for the prompt discharge of every officer, teacher, or employee of the academy who permits or condones hazing, or such fighting as is had under the so-called "code," then we would hear no more of these outrageous and shameful occurrences.

Since the investigation of the Military Academy at West Point and the passage of the act against hazing that was put upon the statute book, which applies to the Military Academy but not to the Naval Academy, there has not been any hazing there. Whenever the young men in this academy find out that the American people through their Representatives on the floor of this House are determined to see that discipline is maintained in that institution, that every violator of the law shall suffer speedily and certainly the penalty of the offense, and that he will not be permitted to return, I believe the end will come, and that they will recognize that the lower-class men have some rights in the academy which they can enjoy without interference by the upper-class men. I want to say further that, in my judgment, these conditions in the Naval Academy are absolutely un-American. Why? Because if there is one principle upon which this great Republic is founded, it is "equal rights to all, special privileges to none;" that every citizen shall have the same consideration as each and every other one—have equal opportunities and assume equal responsibilities. For upper-class men to domineer over lower-class men is at variance with every American sentiment and ideal.

If there is any other one principle upon which this Government is founded, it is the individual right of every citizen to enjoy absolute liberty within the law. He must not go beyond the law, but he is entitled to the greatest liberty within the limits of the law, and when one classman denies to some other classman in a lower class privileges which he enjoys, by assuming and enforcing the right to do so he strikes at the foundation of American institutions. He assumes "special privileges" and denies "equal rights," and tramples under foot "individual liberty." These are sacred rights to every American citizen and cost the blood of the fathers. I want to stamp my disapproval and voice it upon this floor of the proceedings that have been going on there, and I want to say that I hope this House will take some action which will bring about a different condition of affairs. I want everybody treated right. I would not take away from anyone any rights or privileges consistent with the rights and privileges of others; but I do want to take away from this institution any law or rule of conduct that makes a difference in the classes there, that makes a difference in the sphere in which these young men shall move. I want them all put upon the identical same level and given equal opportunities to acquire their education in this institution, each one having accorded to him the rights that every other one enjoys, and let it be a contest of merit, let it be a contest between American men worthy of being American citizens. I want them to realize that by reason of the fact that they are students in this great academy that they owe something to the Government and they owe something to the constituency of the man who sent them there; they owe something to the honor of the United States, and to the flag that floats above them. Let them do nothing that will place one single blot upon a single star or stripe, but may they add new luster day by day to its honored folds. Let them say to the world we know what chivalry is and we know how to respect the rights of others and to show courtesy and kindness to all, and simply because my brother is in a lower class than I does not make him any less entitled to consideration. We are all Americans, with patriotism beating in our hearts, with the love of country and the honor of the flag uppermost in our minds.

Mr. Chairman, if we can create such a condition as that in this academy it will indeed and in truth be what it was intended to be, a great Government institution where true American ideals prevail, and the young men who attend it will in their lives and by their conduct exemplify the highest type of American citizenship. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. BOWIE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to send to the Clerk's desk to have read a resolution recently introduced into the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the resolution sent up by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 45) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to furnish certain information concerning the cotton crop of the season of 1905 and 1906.

Whereas the estimate of the growing cotton crop made and published by the Agricultural Department on December 4 indicated a total production in the United States for the season of 1905 and 1906 of 10,167,818 bales of 500 pounds each, gross weight; and

Whereas the census returns of the cotton ginned in the various States up to the 1st of December, 1905, show that in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Oklahoma the yield for the entire season as estimated by the Agricultural Department had been more than ginned; and

Whereas neither the picking nor the ginning of cotton in the States named, or in any other of the cotton-producing States of the United States, is completed by the 1st of December, and that therefore the estimate of the Agricultural Department as to the yield of cotton in the States named is plainly an underestimate and likely to mislead, and damage the cotton interests of the United States; and

Whereas in various other States where the picking and ginning is known not to have progressed toward completion even as fully as in the four States named the amount of cotton ginned up to the 1st of December shows that the Agricultural Department's estimate of the yield is unquestionably an underestimate; and

Whereas it is a matter of the first importance to the people of the United States that they be supplied with a more accurate estimate of this season's cotton crop: Therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is directed to proceed immediately to collect such data as may, in his opinion, be necessary for a more correct estimate of the season's crop, and to publish the same on the 10th day of January, 1906, together with a full and complete statement of the method by which the estimate is arrived at and of the details of the various reports comprising said estimate.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $20,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as a special fund to defray the expense of collecting and publishing such a revised report.

Also, the following:

Whereas there is great dissatisfaction and want of confidence in the reports on cotton acreage and production by the Department of Agriculture, especially to the last report, made on December 3, 1904: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby requested to forward to the House of Representatives all data, in detail, upon which said last report was made and published, said report to cover all sources and kinds of information upon which said report was based.

Mr. BOWIE. Mr. Chairman, the first of these resolutions was introduced a few days ago into this House by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING], claiming that the Bureau estimate of the Department of Agriculture of the amount of the cotton crop as of the 1st of December, 1905, was an underestimate thereof.

The last of these resolutions was introduced about a year ago by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], who claimed that the Department's estimate at that time was an overestimate of the crop. So that we see that the Department's estimates have been assailed both from the South and from the North. They have been assailed on the part of the consumers of cotton and likewise on the part of the producers of cotton, and this brings before the consideration of this Congress a very important question.

The cotton crop is the most valuable crop produced in the States of the South and one of the most valuable crops produced in the United States of America. When you consider its value after it has been manufactured, it is the most valuable and important of all the crops grown in this country.

The Department of Agriculture, in pursuance of an act of Congress, is required every year, on the 1st of December, to make an estimate as to the probable yield of the crop for that year, and the question that comes home to us, as raised by these resolutions, is whether or not that law of Congress should be amended or repealed, or whether we should stand upon the law as it exists; and this question involves chiefly the fairness and accuracy of the work of the Statistical Bureau of the Department of Agriculture.

Now, I want to say at the outset, when a year ago the Department's estimate was made of over 12,000,000 bales of cotton the price of cotton went down and a great complaint came from all over the South. I took the position in the public press at that time and on the floor of the House that notwithstanding the fact that the price of cotton fell upon the publication of that report, I believed it was in the main accurate and true, more so than any other report coming from any other source, and that I thought the system ought not to be abolished; and when the gentleman from Massachusetts now assails that report upon the ground that it is an underestimate I take the same position, and I say that, representing in part the people of the South and voicing the views of such of its representatives as I have had the honor to consult, we of the South only want the Department of Agriculture to give a fair, honest, and impartial report upon the conditions of the crop and the amount raised, and when they do that we are satisfied. And I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the Department has done that very thing last year and this year.

The basis of the assault upon the estimates of the Department of Agriculture is that in the past they have widely missed the mark. It has been contended that they made a mistake amounting to 10 per cent of the crop of last year.

It has been contended that they made a mistake of from 5 to 10 per cent in the previous ten years.
